Cabinet lets Euro-sceptics off the leash

By Andrew Pierce Polly Newton and Philip Webster

TORY candidates wishing to defy the Government line on the single currency were given Cabinet blessing yesterday as it emerged that parliamentary aides to the Foreign Secretary and party chairman had joined the list of those saying Britain must keep the pound. Only hours after John Major reiterated that ministers who breached the "wait and see" policy would be dis-missed, William Hague, the Welsh Secretary and leading Euro-sceptic, said candidates were free to say what they liked about the euro.

His remarks were supported by Conservative Central Office which said that candidates, provided they were not ministers, had long known that they could express their preferences in their personal

Police praise courage in court of gang rape victim

AN AUSTRIAN gang rape victim flew home to Vienna last night after British police and lawyers praised her re-markable composure while giving evidence of the attack in which she was also subjected to other sexual acts and racial-

But the woman, who heard a jury convict the eighth member of a group of teenagers of the violent sexual assault, broke down in tears at the completion of her evidence.

The woman, aged 32, a mother of a son aged five and daughter of three, had returned to London seven months after a weekend shopping trip ended with the attack by the eight boys near her hotel in King's Cross.

She came back to give evidence at the Old Bailey trial of the 15-year-old youth who denied rape, indecent assault and robbing the woman. The seven other youths, part of a gang left to run wild on the capital's streets, had admitted

Although she has left her husband, the couple remain in close contact.

Her strong willpower was revealed both during the attack and in the witness box. She shed no tears as she gave her evidence and the only moment her composure looked like slipping was when she was asked to study photographs of her attackers.

Even after she was informed that she did not have to look at the pictures if it would upset her, the woman said she would do so if it

Scientist goes to law over pattern on the humble roll

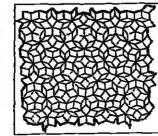

By NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

ONE of Britain's foremost scientists is suing the makers of a leading brand of lavatory

Sir Roger Penrose, Rouse Ball Professor of Mathematics at Oxford University, says that although Kleenex Quilted may be super-absorbent and gentle on the skin, it has no right to achieve this by using the mathematical pattern he designed 20 years ago. In his legal action he seeks destruction of all stocks of the paper bearing the pattern. With Pentaplex Ltd, a company that markets puzzles and other material based on his design, Sir Roger has issued a High Court writ against Kimberly-Clark, manufacturers of Kleenex, claiming infringement of copyright. Yesterday David Bradley of Pentaplex said: "So often we read of very large companies riding roughshod over small businesses or individuals, but when it comes to the population of Great Britain being invited by a multinational [company] to wipe their bottoms on what appears to be the work of a knight of the realm without his permission.

Secret runners join marathon treadmill

By David Powell and John Goodbody

AS THE 40,000 or so runners in this year's Flora London Marathon set off from Blackheath tomorrow they will have hidden company. In more than 60 gymnasiums and health clubs up and down Britain, another 1,500 wouldbe competitors, unable to gain a place in the real race, will take part too — on treadmills. To spur them on, they will be able to watch the official runners on television screens.

The project, devised by the Cancer Research Campaign and dubbed Marathon Mania, is expected to raise £20,000 for the charity. Tracy Cooper, of the Cancer Research Campaign, said:

"We get so many calls from people who do not get places, this way everybody can take part." Just as each participant who completes the 26 miles

385 yards from Blackheath to The Mall will get a finisher's Flora foil blanket, so will the unseen marathoners.

However, some of tomorrow's treadmill runners will have a head start. Those who did not fancy the distance in one press of a button have been allowed to cover it in stages. They have made their way, slowly but surely, for the past two weeks, charting progress on a course map.

The whole idea stemmed from the disappointment of Annette Owen, who trained in a gym to help her recovery from ovarian cancer. She app-lied to enter the 1995 London Marathon but was rejected, so decided that, having trained on a treadmill, she would run the marathon on one.

Sir Roger's action is a far cry from his usual scientific and mathematical work. He collaborated with Professor Stephen Hawking of Cam-bridge in studies of black holes in space. How Major got his smile back on a bruising roller-coaster ride

Continued from page 1 night in which you played the lead role, woke up next morning to sneering and scathing reviews in every paper. Now, imagine you had to go on waking to those reviews, dawn after dawn, year after year." That was not his idea of a buzz.

Major, so far from being an unusually phlegmatic man, is unusually easily bruised. But he is not a quitter. He keeps fighting and it keeps hurting. The result is that he gets very bruised indeed, and for long periods. His mood swings suddenly. On Tuesday in Birmingham, after another weekend's bad press and the opinion polls apparently stuck, his top lip looked like cardboard. At that morning's press conference he kept his head immobile and facial muscles tight, smiling once in half an hour. His eyes were narrow. He blinked often but slowly. The expression was dull and heavy, like Garfield the Cat.

His voice lost all light and shade. The overall impression was of huge but frozen anger, depression and fatigue. On Thursday morning The Times printed a MORI poll suggesting a swing from Labour to the Conservatives. But that was not all: there had been a change in the wind. Tony Blair had looked rattled and new doubts about new Labour and its leader hung in the air. You might think an old pro like John Major would have been ready to disregard this possible blip. But his demeanour at that morning's press conference said otherwise. I challenge experts in physiognomy to freeze-frame the video and take a ruler to Mr Major's eyes. They were wider. His mouth moved. His lip flexed. His eyebrows rose. He smiled. He blinked less and at normal speed. His voice regained

Briton helps stop Pisa tower toppling

BY A STAFF REPORTER

The Leaning Tower of Pisa has been saved from toppling over by a British soil expert. who advised placing large amounts of lead on one side

"We are cuphoric," John Burland, Professor of Soil Mechanics at Imperial College, London, said. The tower has stopped its tilt. This is the greatest success in seven centuries. We did not aim to straighten the tower but halt its inclination otherwise there would be no Leaning Tower.

Work started on the 179ft white marble tower in northern Italy in 1173 and took 186 years to complete. The professor was called in four years ago after it was calculated that the landmark, by then around 17ft off perpendicular, might topple by 2050.

Earlier attempts to halt the tilt, caused by layers of clay, mud and soil beneath it sinking unevenly, all failed. A decision in 1823 to excavate dations caused the tower to lean by an extra lft 6in.

On the professor's advice, 900 tons of lead was laid on the ground around its high side. The Italian Government invested £50 million in securing the 15,000-ton tourist attion, closed seven years

IRA gang 'planned to black out London and South East for months'

LARGE parts of London and the South East would have had no electricity for months if an IRA gang had succeeded last summer in destroying key power installations, the Old

Bailey was told yesterday.

But the alleged plot to plunge consumers into darkness was foiled by a joint operation by police and the security services.

Nigel Sweeney, for the prosecution, said that seven members of an IRA active service unit were in London within months of the ceasefire ending. One of the gang came from an Irish-American background and had served in the Marines where he specialised in demolition and explosives. Using detailed maps of the National Grid they were said to be preparing for a blitz on six sub-stations. An eighth man was to provide the group with support and find premises in the Birmingham area, where a lorry could be secretly unloaded. Mr Sweeney added.

But the gang was under surveillance by police and the Security Service as they reconnoitred their targets last summer. When police raided addresses in London and Birmingham they found National Grid maps indicating the targets and 37 units for powering and timing bombs set out in the basement of a rented home in Peckham, south London.

Yesterday amid tight security the eight all denied conspiracy to cause explosions between January and July last year. They are Gerard Hanratty, 38, Martin Murphy, 38, Donald Gannon, 34; Patrick Martin, 35, Robert Morrow, 37, Francis Rafferty, 45, John Crawley. 39, and

Clive Brampton, 36. Opening the prosecution case. Mr Sweeney said that seven of the men were members of an active service unit which had came over from Ireland to carry out the attacks. Mr Brampton was not part of the unit but provided support such as false identities. Mr Sweeney said that Mr

Principal criticised over £8m college deficit

By DAVID CHARTER

THE sacked principal of a college with an £8 million budget shortfall bullied staff and was guilty of "wilful neglect", an auditors' report said yesterday.

An inquiry by Coopers & Lybrand found the relation-ship between Neil Preston, principal of Stoke-on-Trent College, and a senior female colleague, was one factor which put public funds at the college at risk.

Mr Preston and Helen Chandler, his marketing manager, were dismissed on Christmas Eve after the college investigated a series of complaints by staff about their behaviour. The pair had been absent on paid sick leave since September and were found by The Times in November running a pub in North Wales. After their departure from the 21,000-student college, the funding shortfall was discovered which led the new management to plan 200

redundancies. Coopers & Lybrand was asked to investigate the way controls had broken down. In its report yesterday, it said the controls were damaged by Mr Preston's style, his close working relationship with George Mardle, the former chairman of governors, and "the effect of the personal relationship be-tween him and Mrs Chandler.

The report found the two managers stifled any dissent to their decisions by treating others with "open hostility or ridicule" in front of the rest of the senior management team. When the college decided to change its system for collecting student data, Mr Preston and Mrs Chandler took control from the finance director. In 1995-96 they missed every deadline for sending information to the Further Education Funding Council and ended up vastly overestimating the money they were due.

Mr Preston and Mrs Chandler were unavailable for comment yesterday. They have both lodged claims for unfair dismissal with an industrial

THE family of Alice Collins. the police constable who was shot by an IRA sniper in Londonderry, gathered at her bedside in an intensive care unit yesterday.

Mrs Collins, 46, who has three children, was in a serious condition after undergoing six hours of emergency surgery during the night at Altnagelvin Hospital. Mrs Collins's eldest daughter, who is pregnant, and her son flew home from England to join their father and younger sister at the hospital. Other relatives gathered at the home of Mrs Collins's father in the Protestant Waterside area of Londonderry.

A family friend said: "Alice is a fighter. Everybody who knows her is hoping that her fighting spirit will see her through this difficut time."

James Mehaffey, the Church of Ireland Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, spoke yesterday to the family of Mrs Collins, who is well known in Londonderry. Dr Mehaffey said: "It is quite devastating that a mother of three, a working mother, should be gunned down in the middle of our city. I think the community in Derry is not prepared to lie down under this." Miriam Collins, whose of-fice overlooks the courthouse, told yesterday of efforts to help

Child sees mother die in garden accident

BY PAUL WILKINSON

A MOTHER died yesterday after a tree branch fell on her head as she was mowing the iawn. Her four-year-old daughter witnessed the accident and ran into the street shouting "Mummy's poorly". Neighbours called an ambulance but Sharon Beale, aged in her early 30s, was already dead. Her husband Andrew was working in Italy. He was preparing to fly home to Wistow, North Yorkshire, last night to comfort their children, Harriet, 4, and Nich-

Phil Wade, assistant divi-sional officer of Selby fire station, said the branch of the 90-year-old ash tree, which was about 18ins in diameter, fell because it was rotten. "The tree was outside the garden wall but the branch must have been overhanging the garden. "She had a young daughter playing in the area, and apparently she ran up and down the road saying 'My muramy's poorly' and some-body rang 999." Mr Wade said that by the time officers got to the scene there was nothing that could be done. "It instantly." George Hill who runs a garage business across the village said: "There was gust of wind, just like a whirlwind or a tornado, seconds before I heard a loud crash. Then I saw the branch of the ash tree fall into the garden."

Teenager dies on school skiing trip

By ADAM FRESCO

A SIXTH former died on a school skiing trip hours after winning the prize as the best skier when he fell 60ft from a hotel balcony. Martin Mahoney, 17, was on a week-long break at Badgastein in Austria when the incident happened on Thursday evening, the last day of the trip. He was found by one of his friends, who tried to revive him. Austrian police were yesterday try-ing to discover how he managed to fall from the balcony at the Hotel Bristol

His father, also called Martin, a probation officer, said yesterday: "It still hasn't sunk in yet that Martin won't be coming home. The bottom has fallen out of our world."

The dead boy, from Cardiff, was studying A levels in geography, com-puting and geology at St David's College in the city. His mother. Pat, a college lecturer, said: "He wanted to go to university in Bath but he hadn't decided on a career yet. All he knew was that he wanted to

Oxford student who feared exams is found hanged

AN OUTSTANDING Oxford University history student was found hanged in her room, after seeking counselling for depression over her final

Sarah Napuk, 22, an undergraduate at Lady Margaret Hall, had already won a postgraduate scholarship to Harvard to continue her studies. She was expected to achieve first-class honours in her finals in June.

Miss Napuk's body was found hanging in her bed-room in Oxford on Thursday lunchtime. Thames Valley police said.

Sir Brian Fall, the principal of Lady Margaret Hall, said: "She was extraordinarily gifted academically and an outstanding student of this university. The quality of her work has been at the level to produce a first throughout her time here.

"Sarah played an enormously supportive role in welfare issues throughout the college. She went out of her way to advise and help people she found in trouble." he said. Sir Brian said Miss Napuk had sought advice from the college's medical and counselling services, but he could not give further details of confidential information. Miss Napuk, who was engaged to be married to Jason Russell, a fellow student, ran the women's rugby team at the college. She was a prominent member of the History Society and a former vice-president of the Junior Common Room at the college, where Benazir Bhutto studied 20 years ago.

Kerry Napuk, an American businessman and his wife Angela, who live in Edinburgh, are devastated by their daughter's death. Her brother David, 20, a student at York University, said his sister may have fallen victim to exam pressure. "The system at university puts so much pressure on people to the point of this sort of thing happening," he

"Sarah was the greatest person I ever knew and she always will be. She was loved by everyone and she gave love to everyone. She was a great woman in every single aspect. Everyone who knew her loved her. She helped everyone she knew. She was always fighting for causes and helping to make things better for everyone."
He said his sister had returned home for Easter and appeared to be in good spirits.

She seemed okay. If she hadn't, then I would have gone back down with her." he Miss Napuk was a pupil at the Mary Erskine School in Edinburgh, where she was head girl, before winning a place at Oxford. On her year off, Miss Napuk undertook aid work in the Middle East Thames Valley police, who are not treating the death as suspicious, said Miss Napuk's body was found by a friend who called round because she had not kept an appointment College friends said Miss Napuk had been very worried about her exams. One said: "She did say she was very worried about not getting a first, but I'm sure she would have got one. She said that she was going to be the only one at Harvard with a second-class degree, but I thought she was only joking."

The college had one previous suicide five years ago when a student, Tracey Cole, 18, killed herself less than a formight after arriving at Oxford. Miss Napuk's death comes a day after an inquest into the death of Alexander Hall, an economics student at Swansea University. Mr Hall, 20, gassed himself in his car. the inquest was told.

A recent report into suicides among students at Oxford found that the rate was 30 per cent higher than the national average for 18 to 24-year-olds. The report also discovered that suicides at the university were significantly lower than in the 20 years before and after the Second World War. -

As a result of the report, which was published in 1993, the University Counselling Service more than doubled in size, individual college sup-port systems were strengthened and newcomers to the university were offered advice on how to adapt to college life.

Self-doubt plagues 'even most brilliant'

BY DAVID CHARTER EDUCATION CORRESPONDENT

A FEW outstanding students are prone to extreme levels of self-doubt, putting their lives at risk, a senior Oxford don said yesterday. An analysis of student suicides and suicide attempts at the university showed that many of those involved simply refused to accept their own brilliance. The Rev Dr Ernest Nicholson, Provost of Oriel College and chairman of the university's student health committee. said: "If you have an extremely talented person racked with self-doubt and low self-esteem, it can be a terribly explosive mixture.

Dr Nicholson said he vividly remembered a suicide note from a brilliant student "I am not perfect and I cannot accept it." The note was referred to in the Hawton Report, a study of the 21 undergraduate suicides and 254 attempts between 1976 and 1990.

The report said there were varied and complex reasons for the incidents. But Dr Nicholson added: "One has to bear in mind the very sad fact that not all suicides are preventable. All too often it was someone you would least have expected."

Madeleine Portwood, an educational psychologist for Durham education authority. said suicide was ten times more likely in the run-up to exams, and that students at Oxford and Cambridge were especially under pressure. They think that everyone is going to be let down if they don't achieve what they're expected to," she said.

Teachers who went on strike over disruptive boy may lose jobs

EDUCATION EDITOR

TWO of the teachers who went on strike last autumn rather than teach a ten-year-old boy with a record of classroom disruption face the sack because so many parents have withdrawn children from the

The governors of Manton School in Worksop, Nottinghamshire, have issued provisional notices of redundancy to the teaching staff of eight.

or two teaching posts will have to go to balance the books.

More than 20 children were withdrawn from Manton during and after last year's dispute over teaching Matthew Wilson. The school was closed for eight days when the previous governing body twice overturned the head teacher's recommendation that the boy should be expelled. The staff voted to strike rather than accept Matthew back into class. He was eventually transferred to nearby St They meet in the next month to set a Augustine's School, and Eileen Ben-nors, resigned, insisting that the boy's behaviour did not warrant expulsion and claiming that the National Association of Schoolmasters and Union of Women Teachers was using the dispute for recruitment purposes.

Neil Moore, the head teacher of St Augustine's, said that Matthew had settled in so well that he had been made a door monitor. "A lot of the problems he had were to do with the attention that he received. He told me he was determined to put that behind him."

roll has dropped from 207 to 185 in a year and in January local authority inspectors criticised its management. The inspectors' report found that too large a share of the budget was spent on teachers' salaries.

Fred Riddell, who chairs Nottinghamshire's education committee, said that pupil numbers at Manton were likely to drop by another 20 in September, making it almost cer-tain that the governors would have to shed teaching posts. "I warned at the time of the dispute that if there was a strike-by teachers it-would in parents losing confidence in the school and would mean that some parents would withdraw their children," Councillor Riddell said.

However, leaders of the NASUWT, which represents most of the teachers at Manton, argued that it was the governors who were to blame. Eamonn O'Kane, the deputy general secretary, said: "To suggest that the teachers precipitated the problems at Manton is putting the cart before the horse. The problems were already there, and the governors ensured that the dispute went the way it did by acting in a quite diseraceful way. They youngster and allowed the problems to develop.

Mr O'Kane said the union would press for voluntary redundancy or redeployment to another school, if the governors cut jobs.

Parents are threatening to withdraw their children from Wawne Primary School near Hull next week if Kevin Crabb, its suspended head teacher, is not reinstated. He may face disciplinary action for allegedly slapping two pupils, although the Crown Prosecution Service has decided not to press chan

'Lost' art hoard is found in government collection

ARTS CORRESPONDENT

THOUSANDS of paintings, drawings and watercolours whose whereabouts have been unknown for decades are in the Government Art Collection, it was disclosed yesterday.

Paintings by modern Brit-ish masters such as Walter Sickert, Paul Nash and Edward Burra, which have long been on scholars miss-ing lists, have been hidden from public view in 500 government offices, embassies and foreign residences.

The first of five catalogues published yesterday reflected the extent of the collection: Henry Moore, John Piper and Lucian Freud are also among the artists behind 2,300 paintings, L800 drawings and watercolours, 200 sculptures, 50 tapestries, 235 photographs and 8,000 his-torical and modern prints. A reception to celebrate the publication was held yesterday at 10 Downing Street. Hayden Phillips, Permanent Secretary at the Department of National Heritage, described the collection as

boasting some of the nation's Hugh Merrell, stressing the importance that art plays in spreading the word about "best creative achievements in the visual arts". He noted that in the 1950s and 1960s, it was Britain. Dr Wendy Baron, who viewed as little more than

"wallpapering" for the middle retires this month after 19 classes. He said it was the years as director of the collecpublic's first opportunity to tion, said: "People will no appreciate the range and quality of the collection. The longer open a book and see a Paul Nash picture described British public, however, is unlikely to see it unless inas 'whereabouts unknown'. We knew it was in the collection and we wanted vited to government offices. others to know." "How many times does one go to a foreign embassy?" said

the publisher and distributor

The collection was established in 1898 with works

extending back to Tudor por-traits. The next catalogues will cover pre-20th century works. Dr Baron said that, at the turn of the century, the expenditure of £300 on works of art was defended before the Public Accounts Committee because the pictures purchased "saved a good sum in decoration of the rooms so adorned".

Being a "good civil ser-vant", she declined to divulge much about the tastes of those in government. Recalling only that Mrs Thatcher had asked for fewer decorative pieces and fewer non-British works, she said that it was impossible to learn something about an individual from their tastes in art. "Some of those I've liked least have had the best tastes in art and vice versa. The most prized items in the collection went to 10 Downing Street and on the whole, prime ministers made

Although there are a few white elephants", which remain in store, the collection receives widespread approval. So much so, it was disclosed last year, that 472 works have "gone missing".

Boy recovers after attack in which brother died

By Dareh Gregorian

A NINE-YEAR-OLD boy who was subjected to a knife attack that killed his five-year-old brother was recovering in hospital yesterday.

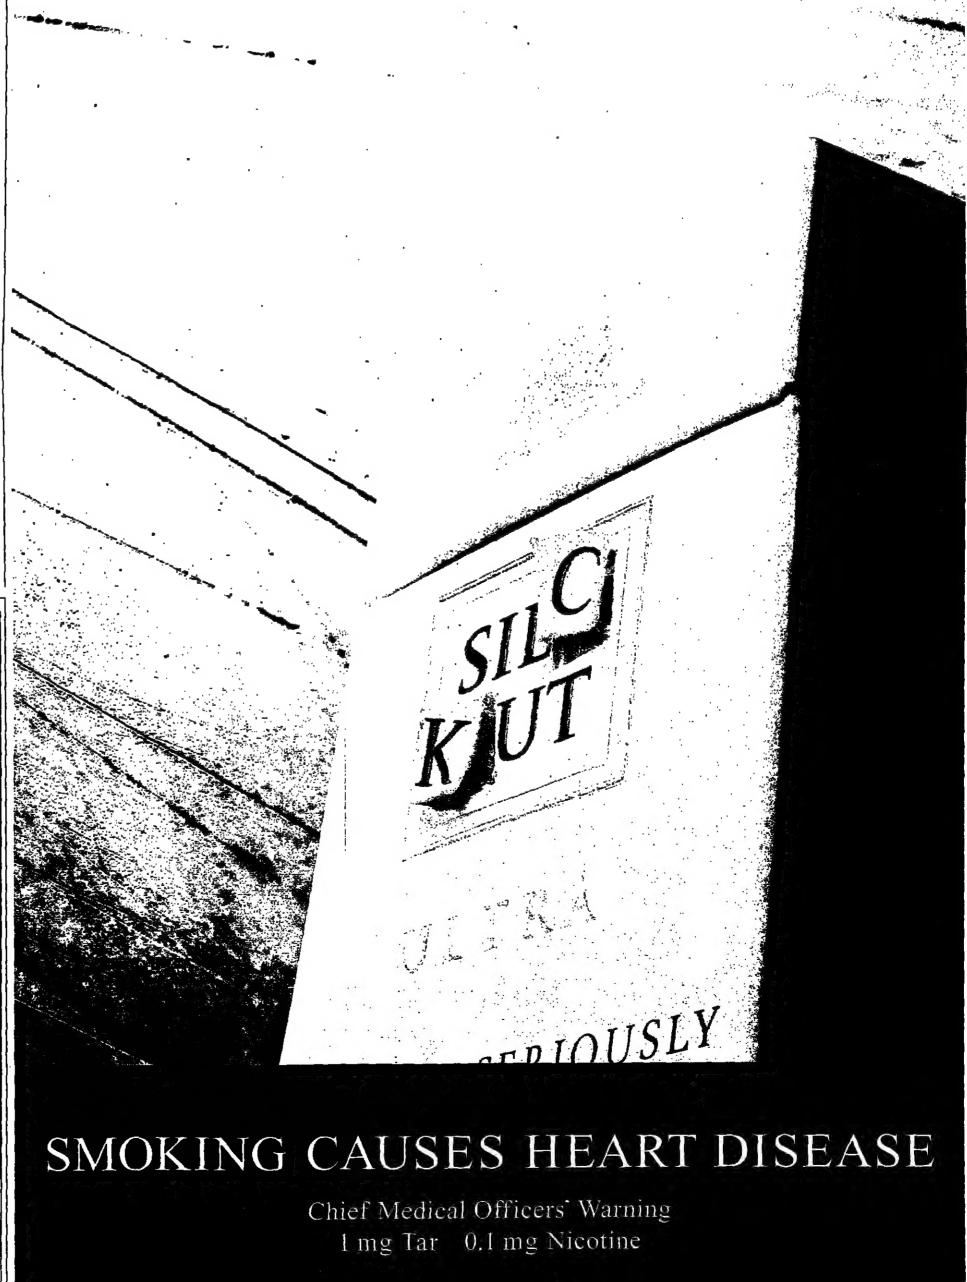

Aaron Philips was stabbed in the neck and hit on the head with a hammer during the assault on Thursday night but he managed to run out of his family's flat in Hemel Hempstead. Hertfordshire, and raise the alarm in an attempt to save his brother, Perry.

Claire Lampey, who lived opposite the Ilat, said Aaron ran to a friend's home screaming that someone was "trying to kill Perry". She added: "Aaron was covered in blood and he was obviously injured." Police and ambulance were called but the younger boy could not be revived.

A police spokeswoman said that a woman had been threatening to blow up the flat if anyone came near by turning on the gas taps. Police were only able to enter the apartment after gas board workers turned off the supply to the

Aaron was last night in a serious but stable condition at West Hertfordshire Hospital. ☐ Police yesterday charged a 29-year-old woman with murder and attempted murder.

Tribal chiefs accuse politicians of destroying their culture and traditions

Canadian Indians protest at ban on fur imports

BY KATHRYN KNIGHT

CANADIAN Indians visited London yesterday to demand that the Government cancel its proposed ban of fur imports.
Resplendent in traditional tribal costume, Indians from the Cree, Ojibway and Sarnia nations gathered outside Parliament and control of the Cree liament and accused polit-icans of destroying their culture and traditions, which are based on hunting mink, beaver and fox.

Under a proposed Euro-pean Union directive, which Britain strongly supports, furs from animals killed by leghold traps and other traditional methods will be banned. But yesterday Chief Ovide Mercredi, a Cree and the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, the princinal Canadian Indian organisation, accused politicians of double standards and being smug about animal welfare. After a traditional indian cleansing ceremony in which lemongrass and sage were burnt in a shell to represent renewal, and the vapours passed from person to person with the beat of a drum, the chief said that by bowing to the demands of animal welfare activists, politicans were gradually destroying the livelihoods of the 623 indigenous communities in Canada. This led many to turn to alcohol and drugs, and commit suicide. Three quarters of fur trapped by the Indians is sold to the European market and they have no other source of income. "If the ban goes ahead the EU will be responsible for cultural genocide," Chief Mercredi said. "We have already suffered a lot and our culture is gradually disap-

Queen Victoria: gave Indians trapping rights

pearing. Our land is like the crofters' land in northern Scotland - most of it cannot be used for agriculture and we have very little other means of earning our livelihood."

He said many Indians were now dispossessed, living in substandard housing, with a 70 per cent unemployment rate. They had no means of developing an economy and no autonomy. Suicide rates among the indigenous peoples were four times higher than in the rest of Canada.

The chief, accompanied by Chief Ray Rogers, from the Chippewas of Sarnia, and Chief Willie Littlechild of the Ojibway, said that around 170,000 Indians would be directly affected by the ban. "When your people were lis-tening to the animal welfare thinking of? They should obey the laws they make, laws which exist for the sake of humanity. No one can exist without a livelihood."

Chief Mercredi said that the directive violated an international covenant signed in 1966 which stated that in no case could people be deprived of their subsistence. It also violated treaties signed in the 19th century by Queen Victoria honouring indigenous ways of "The Government should be ashamed of itself for violating a treaty made by Queen Victoria that gives our people a right to trap. Study your history and look at how much wealth you derived from the fur trade in the early days of colonisation. Now you will allow those who provided it to be destroyed."

The chief reserved strong words for the animal welfare activists. "Don't be so smug about animal rights," he said. "Our people respect the earth and the land, we respect the sacredness of all life. We pray before we set our traps and when the animal is caught. We respect all life, human and animal. We live on the Earth and give back to the Earth." Around 5 per cent of the trappers use leghold traps but

kill more quickly. But Chief Mercredi said most Europeans missed the point on animal issues. "I am often asked how humane our methods of killing are, and it seems by humane killing you mean killing the animal quickly. Are these the standards you em-quickly the chickens you eat have been killed, the cows and lambs?"

Earlier, the tribesmen had

Computer buff takes offence at cover-up

By A STAFF REPORTER

A SYSTEMS analyst who enjoys strolling naked round his garden is ignoring police warnings to cover up. Alan Raynor says he is determined to defend an Englishman's right to do what he wants in his own castle - in his case a semi-detached house.

Mr Raynor, 50, of Ledbury,

my garden.
The fact is that anyone passing who does not like what they see can simply look the other way. So far as I am concerned, it comes down to a person's right to do what they wish on their own property. I have had no complaints from neighbours and I wasn't even aware of any gossip until police called and said there had been a complaint." He added: "If I feel like

"It is not a matter of decency. I just want the free-dom to walk in my garden in any way I please, look at my plants and sit on the grass if I want to."

Police warned Mr Raynor, a freelance computer software development consultant, that he is in danger of breaching the 1824 Vagrancy Act, which deals with indecent exposure. inspector Geoff Mayor, of Ledbury police, said: "We have no wish to curtail his lifestyle but he could fall foul of the law of indecent

Barristers face fines for being rude ploy everywhere? In that case I ask you if you know how

RUDE or slipshod barristers may have to reduce their fees or pay compensation of up to £2,000 under a complaints system launched yesterday.

The system enables members of the public to complain about "inadequate professional services", and will be overseen by Michael Scott, an independent lay complaints commissioner. Mr Scott, a former major-general recruited after the new post was publicly advertised, said yesterday: "I am a layman so I have no legal handbaggage with me. My aim is to give a fair deal to people while protecting barristers from frivolous complaints."

The new system applies to barristers' advisory or out-of-court preparatory work, but will not deal with complaints over their work in court.

Complainants will be able to obtain compensation only where they have suffered financial loss that would be recoverable in a court action. Losses might include wasted travel expenses and costs incurred through rectifying shoddy work. Compensation will not be paid for distress or inconvenience. Every complaint will be vetted by Mr Scott. Where they are justified, he will seek to resolve the complaint through informal conciliation. If this is not possible, a panel of Mr Scott, two laywers and another lay person will decide if fees should be reduced or compensation paid.

The more serious complaints that appear to involve professional miscon-

over court performance, in line with the duct will go, as now, to the professional Bar's statutory immunity which protects conduct and complaints committee of the barristers from being sued for negligence Bar Council, which may decide to refer it to a disciplinary tribunal with powers to reprimand, fine, suspend or disbar

Mr Scott, whose army career included commanding the 2nd Battalion Scots Guards in the battle for Mount Tumbledown in the Falklands, said: "Inadequate professional service covers the sort of thing where a burrister has been rude, or late, or been idle about returning his papers, or been arrogant with his client, which is not, I understand, unheard of." There are about 450 complaints a year from about I million cases handled by just under 9,000 barristers. About 15 per cent of the complaints resulted in disciplinary action. The scheme will apply to complaints arising since last July.

The main theme of the conference is the disparity in earnings between men and women in the legal profes sion. A survey last year for the Law Society found that women solicitors were facing "shameful discrimination" over pay levels. Their male counterparts were found to be earning significantly more, even allowing for differences in age and experience, and the gap widened the higher up the career scale women rose.

Catholic bishops link poor exam results to poverty

BY RUTH GLEDHILL, RELIGION CORRESPONDENT

THE gap between schools' performance in rich and poor areas will widen if unrestrained competition is allowed, according to a report of the Roman Catholic bishops of England and Wales. A Struggle for Excellence makes a direct link between poverty, wealth and school results.

Although not condemning league tables outright, the report calls for them to take account of other factors as well as examination results to allow parents to compare "like with like" when choosing a school for their child.

The report finds that schools with a larger percentage of pupils eligible for free meals have correspondingly lower GCSE results. Pupils at Catholic secondary schools tended to peform better than the national average, except in the poorest schools, where more than six in ten pupils were eligible for free lunches; their results were universally dismal in Catholic and non-

Catholic schools. It also calls for more flexible and equitable funding for schools and for the scale of need in poor, urban areas to be recognised.

According to figures prepared for the bishops by Ofsted, the Office for Standards in Education, a clear correlation exists between poverty and examination results.

There are 450 Catholic secondary schools in England and Wales, 10 per cent of the total. The report analyses the difficulties and results of 27 Catholic schools in poor, urban areas through interviews with head teachers.

Although the results of most schools in the consultation were below the national average, the report looks at all the conditions facing the pupils and teachers, and concludes that "almost without exception, the participating schools against great odds"."

Father Graham: the first Englishman to head the order for more than 450 years

Augustinian Friars break habit

BY RUTH GLEDHILL

FATHER Paul Graham of Clare Priory, Suffolk, has be-come the first Englishman since the Reformation to be elected provincial of the Augustinian Friars in England and Scotland.

Father Paul will head the eight communities in the order's English and Scottish province for a four-year term, succeeding Father Seamus Ahearne of Carlisle. The Augustinian order, based in Rome, has no founder but came into being in 1256 when the Vatican brought together a group of hermits, some of whom had been following the rule of St Augustine of Hippo.

The Jewish people are a nation forged in slavery to understand and value the importance of freedom. And what it learned from that experience is that true freedom is the very opposite of allowing everyone to do exactly what they want. That leads to what Hobbes calls the state of nature, the war of all against all, and that, in turn, leads to an inevitable ening of life.

But rather than Hobbes's solution of handing responsibility for ensuring personal freedom to the leviathan of the state, Jewish teaching and discipline. This is the paradox of freedom: for one to be free, all must exercise discipline and restraint.

This has been the role of religion throughout the centuries. Speaking personally, I believe the teachings of the Bible to be true, and this is sufficient grounds for holding them up as the highest standards to which humanity even if you take a sociological, as distinct from a moral, view, the teaching has proved impressively effective in leading people to exercise the rePhi straint in their own lives that leads to increased freedom for all. Our society tries to do without religion, tries to leave every moral decision for the individual to work out for themselves from first principles, with no guidance, no help. The only influence it brings to bear is the coercive and corrosive force of police and prison. We can see it does not work.

When everything starts again after winter, when new life is all around, now is the time for each person to consider their own life and the life of their community, and by imposing on themselves even a little more discipline and restraint, enhance their own freedom and that of us all.

Why do politicians love posing with JCB's?

Glenda Jackson's starring role

The week John Major began to hit back

The week in snapshot: Labour gets off to shaky start; Bell and Hamilton cause welcome diversion; poll blow to Labour; Major starts to look happier; fillip for Labour as Browning embarrasses Tory leadership

Philip Webster and Jill Sherman watch Labour flutter

the first floor of Millbank Tower last Sunday Peter Mandelson, Labour's chief strategist, laid down the law. Robin Cook, the Shadow

Foreign Secretary, had just used a television interview to nudge Labour's policy on the single currency to the point where it was virtually ruled out for the next Parliament. Mr Mandelson knew that the press would immediately try out Mr Cook's new line on Gordon Brown, notably more Euro-enthusiast than Mr Cook, and to find out whether it was fully backed by Tony Blair. Surrounded by the aides who would be called on to brief all three, Mr Mandelson gave his orders: there must be no attempt to gloss Mr Cook's remarks. No impression of division could be afforded. They were carried out to the

The policy was hardened overnight, with Mr Brown happily on board: It was the kind of control the vital ingredient in Labour's usually tightly run ship, to which the political world had become accustomed. In the same room this week the strategists listened with increasing horror as the BBC lunchtime news headlined their bulletins with stories that were not good for Labour: the Jaguar chairman disclaiming endorsement of its welfare-to-work programme, and twice with the increasingly arcane saga about whether Labour intended or not to privatise the air traffic control system.

Labour appeared to have lost control of the agenda and when The Times MORI poll on Wednesday night showed a big dent in its lead hearts began to pound a little. It has been a week that has proved an old adage: the team front is always the more vulnerable. It seems almost laughable ten years on, but the Conservative machine was close to falling apart on Wobbly Thursday, one week before the 1987 election, which the ries went on to win by 100 seats. The big opinion poli leads held by Labour for several years have always been doubled-edged. Party leaders have always known that the margins were unrealistic and expected that in the election run-up they would be severely cut back. And they always knew, too, that when that moment came they would have to hold their nerve. What has dismayed some

Labour insiders these past few days is that this supposedly brilliant Labour campaigning machine, the one that has selfconsciously prided itself on winning the last two election campaigns even if it lost the election itself, has contributed heavily to its own problems.

Labour believes that there are three kinds of "switchers". those former Tory voters whose conversion, temporary or permanent, now account for the large Labour lead. There are the hard cases who have given up on the Conservatives; there are those who say they are pretty confident of going over; and there are those who are looking for an excuse to go back. When the campaign went askew last weekend, with a series of briefings adding up to stories that Labour was doing to a U-turn on the unions and privatisation, it gave that third group their reason for returning home. They probably would have done so at some point in the campaign; but here was an early opportunity.

Labour's uncomfortable week had begun with headlines in the morning newspapers last Saturday dominated by Mr Blair's alleged insult to the Scots over the powers of their parliament.

But by then Labour was also preparing a damage-limitation exercise over expected Sunday paper stories alleging secret deals with the unions. To dellect them, the spin docmore accurate story: that Mr Blair was to deny them much of what they wanted.

Perhaps the root of Labour's difficulties at that time had been the acknowledgement that there was a £1.5 billion hole in their finances, and what seemed to many in the party an almost indecent haste to suggest that Labour would necessary fill the hole through privatisation.

That resulted in more Sunday stories suggesting that Labour would privatise any-thing that moved and led on to the great "our air is not for sale" row that refused to go

The message of those three episodes — no higher taxes in Scotland, no favours to the unions, no hostility to privati-sation — was what Labour wanted to get across. But taken together they gave the impression of retreat and allowed John Major to begin charges. And that was Labour's biggest error this week. Its behaviour transformed the Prime Minister. Tetchy at the start as Martin Bell launched his assault on Tatton, Mr Major by yester-day had become a bundle of laughs. He has not behaved like a man for whom political

Even yesterday, after the single currency made its first serious appearance in the election campaign and raised questions over the future of ministers who breached the agreed line, Mr Major refused to be daunted. He was always happy to take questions from "you rough lot" - unlike Mr Blair, around whom a cordon sanitaire had been erected. beckoning.

whom was responsible for the joke Mr Major, with Michael Heseltine and, to a lesser extent, Kenneth Clarke, is the Tory campaign, When Mr Major is on form. Central Office hums. Labour privately admits that the Tory machine has been running better than it expected.
At Millbank Tower what happened this week was not so much a wobble as a flutter. Inexperience is a big factor. On that open-plan floor where each of the Shadow Cabinet has his or her "anchor" back at base, there are about 120 staff working virtually round the clock. Most of them are young. At 49, David Hill, Labour's communications director, is the oldest. Some of them have wondered privately this week why their chiefs were not doing more to attack; where were Labour's big issues. health, education and unem-

even have panicked at the first whiff of things going wrong. One said: "We are not doing well. They are making the hits. We are watching them.' Another suggested that Lab our appeared to be "going through the motions".

The campaign chiefs are urging all to keep calm. It is reported by insiders that Mr Mandelson and Mr Brown. who fell out as friends at the leadership election in 1994, are working more closely together than they have for years.

An insider said: There is no time for old rivalries." After yesterday's press conference Mr Brown loudly congratulated Mr Cook, another old adversary, on his performance.

The campaign chiefs say that the attack strategy is in place as it has always been. The grid, the campaign plan locked up in the offices of Mr Mandelson and Mr Brown. has not changed.

The insiders deny a rethink but the campaign is changing up a gear this weekend. Yes terday's assault on Europe was the first sign of that.

Spin nurses keep media on message in the holding pen

James Landale and Polly Newton on the language of Labour's battle bus

THE strange enclosed world of the election battle-bus. where spin doctors, party leaders and journalists shuttle up and down the country for. up to 18 hours a day, has begun to spawn a language of its own.

The Labour camp is the most creative but all parties, after three weeks on the road, are developing a jargon impenetrable to outsiders. The Times correspondents on the buses translate:

Holding pen. Area cor-doned off for the media during Labour's stage-managed walkabouts to prevent easy access to Tony Blair. Example "Get back into the holding pen now!" John Major calls them cordons

Slightly corralled. Labour spin-doctor description of what happens to the media in holding pens. Example "Of course you will be able to talk to Mr Blair. You will only be slightly corralled."

Spin nurses. Junior Labour press officers, often women, who get frustrated when the media refuse to obey them. Example: The spin nurses are getting their knickers in a twist again."

Labour's battle bus at the start of the campaign

On message. Spin doctor-speak for stories written by reporters which faithfully follow the party's agenda and report everything their leader has said, however uninteresting. Example: "Stay on mess-age and I'll treat you right."

Off message. Opposite of the above, usually occurs when reporters actually manage to speak to ordinary members of the public who have not all been personally vetted by a press officer. Example: "Stay off message and I'll never give you a story

Tight schedule. Spin doctor-speak for the apparently urgent need for the media to get back on battle bus to avoid heing late for the next stop. In reality, a device to prevent reporters talking to people who might be off message (see above). Example: "We are on a tight schedule, please get back on the bus now!"

Muffins. Name given by Tory men to the hordes of young blonde women who answer the phone in the press office at Conservative Central

ry, one of the muffins will make the teal

Mother. Tory-speak for Baroness Thatcher, Example: Mother is returning to the A briefette. A briefing done by Paddy Ashdown from the front of the top deck of his battle bus.

Liberal Democrat-speak for anything that involves their techno-fiend leader looking at computers.

Paddy's rally speech (Take 1). The text of Mr Ashdown's evening speech, issued to journalists under embargo in mid-afternoon. Paddy's rally neech (Take 2). The speech Paddy actually makes.

TB. Labour acronym for Tony Blair. Example "TB's on the BB, the press on PB I and 2 ETD to ICA ASAP. Return ETA at MBT at 1430 hours." Translation: "Tony Blair is on the battle bus, the media are on press buses One and Two. Estimated time of departure for the Institute of Chartered Accountants is as soon as possible. Estimated arrival back at Millbank Tower (Labour's London HQ) 2.30pm.

Heseltine steps up assault with gibe over union links

THE Tories stepped up the assault on Labour's links with the trade unions yesterday and tried to undermine the party's launch of its business

Michael Heseltine seized on the Essex firemen's decision, announced yesterday, to strike on two days this month as an example of what would be in store under a Labour government. The firemen are Heseltine said a re-elected Tory government would curb strikes in essential services.

The Deputy Prime Minister also produced a report that the GPMU print union was threatening staff at a firm in Exeter with £300 fines unless they abandoned a local agreement. He said that the union. led by Tony Dubbins, had warned them not to accept anything below the national demand and in the same doc-

New name more than window dressing in reassuring business

WHEN a special Labour conference approved the rewriting of Clause Four two years ago, Tony Blair joked - to somewhat strained laughter - that he was not intending to change the name of the party.

Of course, he has. It is now "new" Labour. But, perhaps, he should go further and drop the Labour altogether. The public image of the party now has no recognisable link vith the trade union created party of old. The unions have been written entirely out of the script.

They, and not just the striking Essex firemen, are off message.

are impressed by Mr Blair.

Afterwards, I joined the travelling circus when Mr Blair and his wife Cherie (more relaxed in person than on television) visited a factory making payphones in Croydon. There were no signs of any jitters in the Blair entourage about the plant being non-unionised with many of the workers earning just £4 at hour. Labour does have a new relationship with much of business, and not merely in the sense that most industrialists are no longer alarmed by the prospect of a Labour government. They are impatient with the Tories, particularly because of the party's divisions on Europe.

But this puts a big onus on Mr Blair to create a business-friendly environment. So far, he has succeeded in reassuring many that Labour is no longer a uniondominated or anti-business party.

There in the great hall of the Institute of Chartered Accountants Mr Blair presented an unashamedly pro-capitalist document as he and new Labour were endorsed by wellknown industrialists. Of course, most senior executives are still instinctively Tories, and will vote that way, but you no longer have to be a maverick to be publicly pro-

When the invisible forces for change sweep a country, as the polls suggest they are doing this time, it is traditionally the third party that gets squeezed, as the polls this time confirm. One of the undoubted successes of Tony Blair and new Labour is that .they appear to have won over Tory voters directly to their face a difficult choice. Should they hammer into the Tories, who mostly hold the seats they are capable of winning. or should they snaffle disenchanted voters by portraying status quo? To portray both parties as bad as each other betrays a lack of priorities and suggests there is a middle way between Major and Blair, even though the Lib-Dems are now clearly to the left of both of them. It is a muddle they should unravel in broadcasts to come if they are to win a significant number of seats.

Sebastian Coe: defending the three-way marginal of Falmouth and Camborne for the Tory party

Coe's finish leaves heckler speechless

LARRY the taproom comedi-an chuckled maliciously with his fellow rustics at the bar as he watched the fresh-faced young man with the shandy.

"He'll need something stronger than that when the votes are counted," observed the grizzled Boris Karloff look-alike "He's out on his ear'ole -- next stop the labour exchange."

Blissfully unaware that he was not among friends, Se-bastian Coe, the Olympic gold medallist and Tory candidate for Falmouth and Camborne. was speaking of his deep affection for Cornwall, They called me a carpet-bagger before I won this seat last time, but I think that has been laid to rest," he said happily. Larry was muttering into

"First time I have seen him in a month of Sundays. The least Seb could do is buy us a pint."
Sunlight reflected off Mr
Coe's shiny new Land Rover in the car park of the New Inn at Mabe, a village on the edge of Falmouth. A party worker wondered if he should stand guard over the vehicle after observing Labour and Lib Dem posters the length of the street opposite.

his beer about outsiders.

It is anyone's guess who will win this three-way marginal, where both Labour and the Liberal Democrats claim to be the main challengers to the Tories. Coe's majority of 3.267 in 1992 can give him little cause for complacency.

marked decline in farming and fishing. Male unemployment in some pockets runs at well over 55 per cent. Falmouth's ship-repair yard lost a 1,000 jobs in the early 1980s. Work has picked up but only short-term and casual contracts are on offer.

Beetling his brow in a scowl, Larry reminds his mates that he was one of those sacked from the shipyard. With yet another pint on board, he is now ready to ambush the Tory candidate.

Finishing his shandy and leaping to his feet in one lithe movement, Mr Coe strides purposely from the New Inn. Larry is not to be cheated of his moment of celebrity. Like the Ancient Mariner, he holds out a gnarled hand to halt his victim in mid-stride. "You

Mr Coe assumes a permasmile and answers as best he can. On state benefits and free holidays for the elderly he struggles, but Europe is his strong suit. "We've got to be in the EU - jobs rely on our membership. But we must be careful not to accept some of the baggage that goes with it.

Perhaps it is the confident smile, for by now Larry appears deflated. His friends have begun nodding in approval at Mr Coe's performance and the Ancient Mariner has lost face.

The Tory candidate treats the bar to his best smile. Larry, at first speechless, now formally admits defeat and offers his best wishes for the

Jackson upstaged by Nora Batty

THE Glenda Jackson campaign roadshow rolled into Yorkshire looking for youth votes vesterday. Curiously some party official responsible for planning her national itinerary had decided to send her to Holmfirth, where evergreen septuagenarians frolic in the television series Last of the Summer Wine.

Holmfirth, tucked in the foothills of the Pennines, is the sort of place where you have to look very hard for the youth vote. The first stop was billed as a visit to a street stall staffed by young Labour members. The two largely bald men in their late 50s who greeted her might be young by Last of the Summer Wine standards but it was pushing credibility a

Ms Jackson then set off up and down the cobbled streets worn smooth by pilgrims to Nora Batty's house. She resisted the temptation to knock on the door and ask the real-life occupant if Nora was home. But she did stop by at Sid's cafe, which also features prominenty in the programme, and posed for pictures with a model of the woolly-hatted Compo.

One is tempted to wonder if Ms Jackson ever gets fed up with landing the showbusiness slots in Labour's quest for votes. If so, the joy visiting somewhere like Holmfirth is that there is never any danger of people getting excited about her status as a double Oscar winner. She just cannot compete with her fictional screen

bined age must have been at least 180, outside Sid's café. Unfortunately, they hadn't come to see her. "We've come to see Nora's house," chattered one jady.

The trio rushed over to pose for snaps with the Compo dummy and were rather bemused to find newspaper photographers ushering the lady in red into the frame as well. "I have to admit I have only ever seen about three episodes of Last of the Summer Wine," con-fessed Ms Jackson. "But I have always thought it was marvellous when I did see it," she added quickly.

She had rejected the national schedule drawn up for her by party officials and insisted that the majority of her time be spent defending her slender majority of 1,440 in Hampstead and Highgate. But she had led a session of bingo in Birmingham yesterday and been to a dinner in Cardiff. She declared she was enjoying herself. "It is always very interesting to get out and about and see people. I don't find it is true what you read that people are apathetic about the election."

The hunt for youth was forced to leave Holmfirth and turn to Batley instead. Here nothing had been left to chance as the engagement was at Batley Youth Theatre where teenagers performed a short show called Vote, which has been touring the area encouraging peers to do just that. She was clearly well satisfied to have finally found some youths.

"It is particularly interesting that they say that they tics before they started doing the show but in the course of working on it they had

Goldsmith wins court victory on broadcasts

BY CHARLES BREMNER

THE Referendum Party was delighted by the High Court's decision yesterday to examine its claim that the big parties and broadcasters had deprived it of a fair share of electoral air time.

Party officials said they were pleased with the ruling from Mr Justice Sedley that they were entitled to have the full court investigate their claim that the Independent Television Authority had shown "top ready acceptance" of quotas that had been set by a non-statutory committee of MPs and proadcasters. Sir James Goldsmith's party, which wants to obtain a referendum on Britain's future in the Europe Union, is incensed that it had received merely a single five-minute slot on thefive main television channels while the Labour and Conservative parties have been given five ten-minute slots on each. The Liberal Democrati have received four ten-minute slots.

The victory, however, was modest because the judge rejected the Referendum Party's claim; that the BBC had discriminated against it, and ed narrow legal grounds for the new hearing.

Sinn Fein hopes hit by DUP withdrawal

By NICHOLAS WATT

SINN FEIN'S hopes of winning four seats in the election suffered a severe setback yesterday when the Rev Ian Paisley, leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, withdrew his party's candidates from two marginal seats.

To avoid splitting the unionist vote, he said the DUP would give the Ulster Union-ists a free run against Sinn Fein and the SDLP in North Belfast and West Tyrone.

The move means that Cecil Walker, Ulster Unionist MP for Belfast North since 1983, is virtually certain to win. Willie Thompson of the UUP, stands a strong chance of winning the new seat of West Tyrone as the combined 34 per cent Unionist vote is higher than the 28 per cent won by the SDLP and Sinn Fein at last

made next week when the main parties screen the first election broadcasts aimed specifically at voters of Asian

The broadcasts, which will be transmitted on the influential Asian satellite and cable television station Zee TV, are aimed at voters in the 36 constituencies where pollsters predict that the Asian vote could significantly affect the result. Leaders of the three main parties and of the Scottish National Party and the Referendum Party have also agreed to be interviewed individually by the channel.

Although the Asian community has traditionally been solidly pro-Labour by a ratio of seven to three, a recent poll by MORI suggests the emergence of a greater number of floating voters. Anita Anand, head of news at Zee TV, said: The fact that the parties are doing these party election

All three main parties have used endorsements from successful Asian businessmen in their election broadcasts.

By far the slickest produc-tion is from the Labour Party. It includes a contribution from Lord Paul, the Labour life peer who has built up the Caparo steel business in 31 years from a tiny operation funded by a £5,000 loan to an empire worth an estimated £500 million. He says: The new Labour Party is a new political party which is catering to all sections of society. That's what we need in this society."

slogans read out in Hindi. Urdu, Gujarati, Punjabi and Bengali. Ms Anand said that she had advised the parties to make their broadcasts in Hindustani, the most widely understood language of the Asian community, but none had done so.

The Conservative broadcast features an address to voters from Lord Bagri, who rose from being a clerk in a Calcutta metals business to become the first non-white chairman of the London Metal Exchange. His family fortune is worth some £80 million. Seated in front of a portrait of John Major, Lord Bagri delivers his speech in a very "high" version of Hindi. The broadcast is interspersed with extracts from Mr Major's address to the Commonwealth

Institute in January. The Liberal Democrats' election broadcast features an endorsement from Ramesh Dewan, a publishing and property tycoon, friend of Paddy Ashdown and chairman of the Liberal Democrats' Ethnic Minorities Group.

The Scottish National Party broadcast, shot in the style of a pop video with fast edits and a shaky hand-held camera, is largely in Urdu and appears to be aimed at people from Pakistan and Kashmir living in the Glasgow Shettleston constituency, where the party is fielding its only candidate of Asian origin.

Ms Anand said that the Asian community could have a disproportionate influence on voting results because of where it lived. "Our clout does not come from our numbers, but from our concentration in specific areas." Asian voters represent 36.1

per cent of the electorate in Ealing Southall (west Lon-don), 31.7 per cent in Birmingham Ladywood and in Birm-ingham Sparkbrook and Small Heath, 30.9 per cent in East Ham (east London), 26.7 per cent in Bradford West, 26.4 per cent in Bethnal Green and Bow (east London) and 23.8 per cent in Leicester .

Rivals unite against racists

By Shirley English

POLITICAL rivals in the Glagow seat of Govan put party differences aside yesterday in an attempt to drive the British National Party out of the constituency.
Labour, the Scottish National Party, the Scottish So-cialist Alliance and trade union leaders united to condemn BNP plans to field Jim White, originally from Ayrshire, at the election. Labour and the SNP are locked in a fierce battle for the seat. In 1992 the SNP won 37 per cent of the vote, against Labour's 49 per cent. This time the SNP hopes to capitalise on local Labour splits."

Yesterday, however, the rivals rose above party politics. They agreed that it was no accident that the BNP was targeting Govan, which, if Labour wins, will return Brit-ain's first millionaire Muslim MP, Mohammed Sarwar. About 10 per cent of the voters are Asian, mainly Muslims, with a large number of Sikhs. The BNP advocates forced repatriation of "immigrants".

The three parties pledged not to share any platform with the BNP candidate, and said the organisation should not be treated as a legitimate party. They also said they would support any action by postal workers who refused to handle BNP leaflets in the area, and called on the media not to give the party a platform.

Nicola Sturgeon, for the SNP, and Alan McCoombes, for the SSA, both said they did not want votes from anyone who objected to Labour's candidate on racial grounds.

Blair's trust lies mainly in quality of his own choice

TONY BLAIR may be about to secure sweeping victory at the polls, but while he trusts, just, to democracy to deliver the right result across the country he does not within the Labour Party.

In order to secure quality candidates who can cope adequately with ministerial responsibilities, the Labour leadership has had to bypass the usual selection process by creating new pocket boroughs. Old, in every sense, Labour MPs are having Labour MPs are having their mouths stuffed with ermine in order to make way for figures handpicked for

The process of evicting oldnimers and installing new boys and girls has been masterminded by Sally Mor-gan, an aide in Tony Blair's office with responsibility for party relations. Ms Morgan, a former Labour Students organiser and one time head of campaigns at Labour headquarters, has herself been linked with the Tooting seat held by Tom Cox, 67. Already the Tory defector

Alan Howarth, and Yvette Cooper, a former Indepen-dent leader writer, have been secured the seats necessary to smooth their way into ministries. One other pos-sible beneficiary is the radi-cal barrister and broadcaster Helena Kennedy. Ms Kennedy, according to Millbank fixers, has been mentioned in connection with Dudley North where John Gilbert is retiring. The Labour leadership, apparently anxious at the dearth of legal talent in their parliamentary ranks, need to make a successful professional lawyer Attorney-Gen-

There are so few signed up to the project that we are depating whether they should be concentrated in new Labour priority areas like Health Social Security and Education or areas where they will have to be good to hold their own with outsiders, like the DTI and Foreign Office."

Labour may yet need many more biddable backbenchers in the Upper House. There is a convention, established in the Forties, that the Lords does not frustrate a Government's manifesto commitments. Yesterday, however, Michael Forsyth, the Scottish Secretary, raised the possibility of the Tory majority in the House of Lords sabotaging Labour's constitutional legislation. Livingstone lets fly from behind his iron curtain

war waged by new Labour's latest recruit

KEN LIVINGSTONE was in mischievous mood yesterday, extolling the virtues of new Labour by megaphone and telling the electorate in his Brent East campaign constituency that Tony Blair would make "the finest Labour prime minister since Clement Attlee".

Mr Livingstone, regarded as unreconstructed old Labour, is keeping quiet about his real feelings on how the Labour Party has changed under its new leader. Yesterday, to prove his pedigree as a loyal campaigner, he was busy distributing leaflets that promised 'new Labour, new Britain".

In anticipation, however, that members of the press might try to use his campaign words to impede the Blair revivalist bandwagon, he has imposed an "iron curtain" (his words) around the constituency to try to freeze out reporters seeking interviews. On the telephone in his campaign office, the dilapidated London Apollo Club in Willesden. northwest London, he insisted that he would say nothing until May 2.

However, when The Times caught up with him yesterday as he canvassed in Carlton ward - a run-down, crime ridden area largely populated by council tenants - the loquacious Mr Livingstone could not help reverting to his more traditional knockabout comedy act.

He used megaphone diplomacy to invite the locals to come and have a go at the representative from The Times. Now is your chance to come down and beat up a stooge from the capitalist Murdoch press," he declared, informing a largely absent audience that Times reporters were paid £60,000 a year. No one took him up on the offer, which he described as a legitimate blood sport.

Despite his polite refusal to talk to the press during the election campaign, he was soon affably chatting about doorstep responses he had been getting, including one from a Tory voter. "He said he couldn't vote for someone like me but he just wanted to get rid of the Tory Government."

Back on the megaphone. Mr Livingstone told anyone who cared to listen that it was time for the Tories to go; they had been caught with their hands in the till. A lone voice from an office block shouted:

"Shut up."

An elderly woman who had recently been mugged told Mr Livingstone that she would not vote for him or any one had cared when she had been assaulted. Mr Livingstone, who is nurturing a majority of just under 6.000, took the opportunity to tell her what Mr Blair would do.

Mr Livingstone suggested that The Times interview two of his rivals. He said: "Go and see Stan Keable (from Arthur Scargill's partyl. He wants world revolution today. Or the Tory candidate, he's an arms dealer." The latter, Mark François, a Basildon man, said that he was a defence adviser, not an arms exporter.

In one of his campaign leaflets. Mr François, 31, lists five issues on which he and Mr Livingstone are at opposite ends of the political spectrum. Mr Francois wants a constitutional monarchy and the survival of the pound. Mr Livingstone, he says, wants a republic and a European single currency.

He said: "Mr Livingstone and I are like chalk and cheese but we've had good public debates together on the main issues. The trouble is, he is handing out leaflets promoting new Labour but in the debates he goes on about all the old Labour stuff."

FROM ROGER BOYES IN BERLIN

THE British Secret Service tipped off German police about the suspi-cious activities of an Iranian assas-sin shortly before his hit team attacked and killed Kurdish dissident leaders în a Berlin restaurant. Had the German authorities acted on the information, it might have been possible to prevent the murders — and to keep alive relations with the Iranian regime.

Instead, Thursday's jailing of four members of an Iranian mur-

Kazem Darabi, 38 — seems to have torpedoed Europe's policy of "criti-cal dialogue" with the Tehran Government. The British connection emerged yesterday as lawyers began to speak for the first time in the 3½-year case.

"It is clear that the British were keeping track on people like Darabi, who have been posing as businessmen." said a German lawyer in Berlin. "What is less clear is why the Germans did not act promptly enough." The Kurds were killed on September 17, 1992, during a Socialist International session in Berlin. Darabi — who against Iranian emigres before -had drifted in and out of the sights of German counter-intelligence. In the autumn of 1992 he appears not to have been under surveillance. The police blunder is only one of several puzzling aspects of the case: who, for example, betrayed the Kurds as they sat down to dinner? The hit team, equipped by Darabi, received a telephone call from someone close to the murdered Kurdish leader, Sadegh Sharafkandi, shortly before they left for the restaurant. This Iranian and his presence still breathes suspicion among exiled Iranians. The principal killer was identified by the court on Thursday as an Iranian called "Sharif". He disanpeared soon after the killing, flew to Turkey and then on to Iran where, according to German intelligence, he was awarded a Mercedes 250 limousine for his services.

Rafsanjani says storm with Europe will pass

FROM MICHAEL THEODOULOU IN NICOSIA

PRESIDENT: Rafsanjani of Iran yesterday denounced a court's verdict that Iranian leaders had ordered political murders in Germany, but dismissed a diplomatic row with Europe as a "passing storm" provoked by the United States and Israel

He said Germany's eco-nomic interests could suffer as a result, but there were no specific threats of retaliation in his address to thousands of worshippers at Friday

The Germans broke the hearts of millions of Iranians with this verdict and they are going to suffer for it," President Rafsanjani said. Maxim's turns into wine seller

FROM ADAM SAGE IN PARIS

MAXIM'S, the Paris restaurant, is planning to sell 8,000 "exceptional" bottles of wine in the biggest auction of its kind held in France.

Pierre Cardin, the fashion designer who owns Maxim's. is likely to make several million francs from the auction. He has decided to market some of the most prestigious 100,000-strong cellar, includ-ing "mythical" wines such as Latite, Haut-Brion, Margaux and Mouton-Rothschild.

With experts telling M Cardin that it will take 40 years for diners to drink all the bottles owned by the restaurant, he has "decided to put a selection at the disposition of the public". Some of the bottles, such as a 1945 Mouton-Rothschild, are expected to fetch Fr30,000 to Fr40,000

Maître Jacques Tajan, the auctioneer in charge of the sale, said: "All the wines are prestigious and they have also been well conserved, i am extremely demanding." He said he hoped to better the Fr3.3 million record for a French wine sale.

The auction comes at a time when Maxim's is struggling to live up to an illustrious past, with food critics attacking its menu and some clients an-

Censorship fear as China adviser joins of colony's Hong Kong paper

STAFF on Hong Kong's flagship English-language daily say they are afraid that a censor is being employed who will vet any copy for unfavourable references towards China, which takes over the colony in 80 days.

Feng Xi Liang, 75, founder editor of the China Daily, a Communist Party mouthpiece, will take up a job as China consultant at the South China Morning Post next week, Jonathan Fenby, editor of the Post, announced.

Mr Feng's most recent job was consultant to Windows magazine, a Hong Kong publication which is considered so patriotically correct that it was distributed to passengers flying China's national airline, "It is absolutely clear that he will be a quasi-political commissar," a senior Post reporter said, "What really worries me is reporters will start changing the slant or toning down a story just so they can be sure it gets into the paper." Another said: "This is just the start, it is very sinister.

Staff at the paper have not been told officially of Mr

Mr Feng's appointment comes amid concerns from Hong Kong's pro-democracy faction that the Post is shying away from extensive coverage of the territory's political issues and is beating a "patriotic" drum to sidestep any problems with China after the July I handover.

Last June, the Post appointed Sir Percy Cradock, a former British Ambassador to Beijing and a supporter of a depoliticised Hong Kong, to its editorial board. In October, the paper devoted its entire front page to a single photograph of Four commanders purged in Yeltsin bribes crackdown

FROM RICHARD BEESTON IN MOSCOW

PRESIDENT YELTSIN yesterday made good on his pledge to crack down on corruption in Russia, when he dismissed four of the country's top military officers, accused of abusing their ranks.

The Kremlin confirmed that the Russian leader had signed a decree sacking General Vladimir Semyonov, the commander of land forces, General Anton Terentyev, his deputy in charge of training. Admiral Igor Khmelnov, the Navy's Chief of Staff, and Vice-Admiral Vyacheslav Kharnikov, the commander of the Northern Fleet.

All four men have been accused of corruption and are under investigation by the chief military prosecutor's office, which said last month that it was looking into allega-tions involving 100 senior officers, including 20 generals.

General Semyonov, a former Soviet Deputy Defence Minister, had been expecting his dismissal for months. In December, Igor Rodionov, the Defence Minister, accused him publicly of corrupt pracnoes. It was alleged that his wife was involved in suspect arms deals and that he had illegally bought his Defence Ministry dacha, as well as a mansion on land belonging to a military hospital, for a fraction of the market price.

Admiral Khmelnov, the second ranking officer in the Navy, has been under investigation for allegedly receiving millions of dollars for the sale of 64 decommissioned warships. The proceeds were supposed to be spent on the construction of new housing for naval officers serving in the Pacific Fleet, where some apartments were built for the admirul's family and friends. has "its doubts" about the

US judge rebuked for attack on Britain

FROM JAMES BONE

Irish-American judge who launched into an anti-British diatribe while sentencing a British woman for killing her baby in New York has been reprimanded.

Judge Robert Hanophy lashed out at the British legal system last year while sentencing Carolyn Beale for suffocating her newborn daughter and trying to smuggle the body back home.

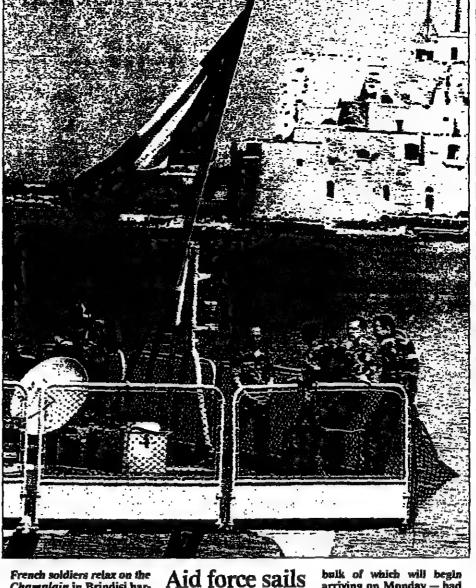

The judge attacked Brit-ain's Infanticide Act, which urges leniency for women suffering from post-partum depression, and derided British courts for wrongly convict-ing the Guildlord Four for IRA bombings. New York State's Commis-sion on Judicial Conduct ruled that Judge Hanophy's remarks, particularly his reference to Northern Ireland, was "mean-spirited and political in nature". He had "failed to act like an impartial judge".

Judge Hanophy was upset when Beale's father, Peter, had called the American criminal justice system "barbaric and uncivilised" for keeping his daughter waiting to months for her case to be settled, including time at a

Beale tried to go to New York to testify on Judge Hanophy's behalf. Michael Dowd, her lawyer, said she considered that the judge had treated her fairly by sentencing her to time served plus five years' probation and letting her return to Britain.

FROM TOM RHODES

AMERICA reached a deal to avert a trade war with Europe last night, settling a dispute over strident legislation punishing all foreign investment in Cuba.

The Commerce Department confirmed that an agreement Washington and Brussels over the Helms-Burton legislation signed by President Clinton

Sir Leon Brittan, the EU Trade Commissioner, said the accord would permit both sides to address the long-term implications of foreign investment in third countries. He said that Europe could sus-pend the World Trade Organisation panel considering the complaint, which was due to be filed on Monday.

The Clinton Administration had long hoped to improve relations with its European partners over the issue of business with President Castro's regime, and was thought to have offered a compromise to modify the terms of the legislation. Stuart Eizenstat, the Under Secretary of Commerce, was to provide details of the agreement last night. These were thought to be similar to a plan which has been circulated on Capitol Hill.

That calls for the European Union to "establish disciplines to deter" private companies in Europe from investing in confiscated property, not merely in Cuba but throughout the

In exchange, Congress would be asked to ease certain provisions in the Helms-Burton legislation, including the exclusion from the US of foreign executives whose companies deal with Cuba.

European countries, including Britain, would be asked to adopt an across-the-board principle that corporations not be allowed to profit from investing in properties confiscated without compensation.

President Clinton has employed a regular six-month waiver to delay the most controversial element of the law, which allows any American whose property was con-fiscated after the 1959 Cuban revolution to sue foreign corporations using their assets.

Soaking up the adulation

THE flamenco dancer, Joaquin Cortés, as famous for stripping to the waist in his performances as he is for his romance with supermodel Naomi Campbell, made a startling revelation in an interview recently. Señor Cortés told El Pais newspaper: "I am not a dancer. I am an artist. I am a musician, choreographer, director, actor and model. I am a sponge." Yet his comments, far from generating bafflement, seem to have enhanced his popularity. In a recent poll among Spanish housewives, he was voted, by an overwhelming majority, the "most exciting man in Spain".

between the Sphinx and Torquemada", the infamous Inquisitor-General. Tired of being derided week after week, conservatives now want revenge. Leading members of the party, who have received backing from the right-wing ABC daily newspaper, have called for their own programme of rubber puppets — a "contraguiñol", or a sort of Spitting Back.

In an editorial last week, ABC attacked the programme as "a laboratory for Socialist agit-prop ... at the exclusive service of Felipe Gonzalez". All politicians on the Right, the newspaper continued, were depicted invariably as "buffoons and illiterates". Conservative politicians were within their rights to call for a "televisual

The controversy has provided welcome publicity for Canal Plus, as viewing figures leapt by several thousand after ABC's assault.

Aware that an attack on rubber puppets could prove politically counter-productive, senior ministers have scurried to the press to deny that they found Las noticias del guiñol offensive.

Rodrigo Rato, the Deputy Prime Minister with responsibility for the economy, said he thought the programme perfectly amusing. A source within the ruling party. however, revealed that Senor Rato's is a minority view.

"We detest those nasty little dolls," he said, "and that nasty little man Polanco."

Carlos Bousono, the writer and academician, fumed: "It is highly improper that the Royal Academy should not be invited to a debate on the future of the Spanish language." Its presence would have lent weight to the conference, many believe, as it has set itself the daunting task of finding ways to protect Spanish from the "Anglo-Saxon onslaught", as a local paper put it.

Assisi frescoes 'not by Giotto'

THE peace of the Umbrian hilltop town of Assisi has been shattered by claims by two respected authorities on Italian art that 13th-century frescoes in the town's great Basilica are not by Giotto, as long believed, but his neglected older mentor,

Pietro Cavallini. The theory threatens to stand art history on its head, since Giotto is traditionally credited as the artist who led Western art away from the flat, stylised depictions of Byzantine art and towards the naturalism and perspective of modern Western painting. Dante depicts Giotto in the Divine Comedy as the man who created the starting point for all Western art by giving it life and movement. In the massive Upper Basilica of Assisi, brown-habited Franciscan friars use electric torches to highlight details of the great series of frescoes on the lower walls, painted between 1290 and 1295. But according to Professor Federico Zeri, a leading art historian, and Bruno Zanardi, an art restorer who has spent ten years cleaning the cycle, only seven of the 28 frescoes can be said "with any certainty" to be by Giotto di Bondone (1266-1337).

Most of the others, the two experts have concluded, are by Cavallini (active 1273-1321), who was lêted in his time as a painter and mosaicist of genius, but whose reputation has been overshadowed by that of his pupil. Professor Zeri's investigations in Assisi with Signor Zanardi are being published as Il Cantiere di Giotto (Giotto's Workshop). They have identified three painters who worked on the St Francis series. "We don't know who the first one was," Signor and the third Giotto." Those paintings assigned to Giotto by the two experts include "probably" the first - St Francis as a Youth in the Assisi Market Place and "definitely" the last six, including St Francis Parting from St Clare, The Canonisation of St Francis, St Francis Cures a Wounded Man in Spain and St Francis Frees a Repentant Heretic. The most famous "Giotto" frescoes — St Francis Preaching to the Birds and St Francis Casting out Devils from Arezzo are credited to Cavallini.

Cavallini is usually considered one of many influences on Giotto, together with Cimabue and Duccio. But Signor Zanardi said he had spotted "unmistakable resemblances" between the Assisi frescoes and surviving works by Cavallini in Santa Maria di Trastevere (on the life of Mary) and Santa Cecilia di Trastevere (Christ, the Aposties and the Last Judgment), both in Rome. Signor Zanardi said that the discovery "in no way detracts from Giotto's greatness ... but we shall have to reassess Cavallini's contribution to the development of art". Confusion had arisen partly because of the mistaken assertion by Giorgio Vasari, the Renaissance artist and biographer, that Cavallini was the pupil and follower of Giotto, when in fact the reverse was true.

Nevertheless, the revenge drama currently being enacted at the Battersea Arts Centre will surely make up in verbal barbs what it

Four intrepid theatre critics have crossed the footlights, and the alleged Great Divide, by agreeing to direct plays. Some take the narrow consumerist line British critics - William Packer, that their only real obligation is to tell their readers whether a show is worth the ticket-price. Others feel a duty to guide performers, playwrights or composers to perfection of their craft. Others have a missionary zeal about promoting a particular school. And there are some working in British newspapers today who nearly always get everything wrong, but are such good fun to read that no sane editor would ever sack them. You see, critics are in the entertainment business too. And they don't need to start directing plays to prove it. But dahlings — break a leg!

so wittily belittled in the past. And, in the spirit of the enterprise, several directors are turning into critics for a night. Which is perhaps just as well, since some of the other critics (ie, the ones who aren't directing shows) have refused to review the ones that are, on the grounds that they don't write about amateur theatre. I say, girls, calm down. Anyway, Sir Peter Hall's review of Mr Kingston's efforts will be in The Times on Monday. (No more than 600 words please, Hall, and do try to keep the paragraphs short)

All this came about because of Michael Bogdanov, a director whose nickname among theatre critics - "Bodger" - goes some way to explaining why he hates them with more vigour than anybody else on the British stage. Except, perhaps the terrifying Steven Berkoff, who always seems to be on the point of emulating Vincent Price in Theatre of Blood and embarking on a bout of hackicide. Or Jonathan Miller, whose monthly threats never to direct opera in Britain again are invariably accompanied by a ti-rade against critics who fail to understand his point. (The first time I ever talked to Miller his greeting remark was: "The Times's review of my Tosca production this morning was disgracefully impertinent - and I use the word in the

Then there's the pushy teenage violinist Vanessa-Mae, who recently took an advertisement to cast aspersions on a critic's qualifications. And Stephen Fry, who burst into tears and left the country after being panned. Actually, now I think about it, almost everybody in the arts hates critics. Anyway, last year Bogdanov

The answer to the first question is that there have been many practitio-ner-critics in history, and there are a good number today. ■ What has the Profumo Affair to do with my bathroom?

have just been squatting on the Cliveden bidet. Not, sadly, the bidet of Cliveden, for I should have been tickled no end as it were — to have settled my buttocks where the great and good once settled theirs: to have savoured just the merest snatch of how it must have felt, in 1963, to be Christine Keeler, staring at the golden taps and wondering what a nice girl like her was doing in a joint like this. Waiting, perhaps, for the War Minister. John Profumo, to bang on the door and inquire whether she was going to be all bloody day in there. But this bidet of mine wasn't in Cliveden, it was in Islington. It was only called the Cliveden. It wasn't even connected, let alone well. And I had my trousers on.

I had them on when I sat on the Sandringham, too. Do not begin to think about what I began to think about when I sat on the Sandringham. Though, mind you, it wasn't half as unnerving as what I thought about when I sat on the Cottage. That is another bathroom suite in the Armitage Shanks range. So is the Tiffany. And the Lichfield. And the Claudette. There they all were in the Islington showroom, in serried rank, set up and twinkled to their best by loving hands eager for them to appeal to the potential owners who strolled, and stared, and touched, and murmured, and pondered. It was a little like Battersea Dogs Home, except for the imploring eyes. That and the fact that if you are looking for a new dog, you do not try sitting on it.

The assistant was not entirely happy about the sitting. In truth, I was not that happy myself, because I was wearing my brown trilby: readers who may occasionally have spotted my front-page mugshot in this hat will perhaps appreciate my unease better than those who haven't, but even these latter may be able to empathise. One does not cut much of a dash sitting on a bidet in a brown trilby. And, since you suggest, one cuts even less of a dash by taking it off and sitting on a bidet with a brown trilby on one's knee. I cannot explain why this is so. You had to be there.

I did, anyway. I had to be there because we are having a new bathroom built, and there is no point ordering new bathroom furniture without trying it out, checking its comfort, all that, so while my wife lay in a number of baths, I sat on the other stuff. That is why the assistant was not entirely happy, because what his elegant showroom had been set up to show was his goods at their very best, looking just as they did in the smart glossy brochure, and in that brochure Armitage Shanks, though it had chosen to include a slim girl in a small towel coming out of the shower, had not chosen to include a plump man in a big hat sitting on the bidet. You could tell how unentirely happy the assistant was by looking at him while he was looking at the other potential customers looking at me, and, as the result, probably becoming less potential by the second.

To say nothing of the fact that, whenever I sat on something new, we had to talk about it. We had to talk about what, both male and female, had to get washed, and whether what I was sitting on was up to these tasks irrespective of gender — the Claudette, for example, and despite its name, has, for a man, a very useful indentation of the rim which is absent from, surprisingly, the Cottage; but then again, the Cottage incorporates a soap recess, which the Claudette ignores — and the assistant, though excellent in every other way, was not quite up to discussing with a man sitting below him in a brown trilby how best, for example, to get his works over the rim of the Cottage in order to take advantage of the soap dish absent from the works-friendly Claudette.

Though none of this - it was, after all. man-to-man - was quite as tricky for him to handle as the questions I was required to ask on Mrs Coren's behalf, regarding sprayspread, jet power and so on, not least because Mrs Coren's head kept suddenly reappearing around us as she sat up in different baths, and the assistant was clearly unsettled by the risk of her overhearing something which concerned her intimately. for insisting on testing only the baths because, she said, it would be embarrassing for her to do the bidets. I fail to see why. She

In pop cultural terms, the damage was done when Sophia Loren revealed that she kept her looks by eating sparingly and working out regularly, puncturing the myth of the pasta-eating Neapolitan fertility goddess.

Luciano Pavarotti did not help the sensual, pleasure-loving artist and be-came instead a shame-faced fat man. Others argue that Italians are not eating properly because they are catching up with modern social trends. The traditional mamma, trailing behind mothers in northern Europe, is now increasingly working as well as looking food culture. Italy may soon catch up. But there is another more sinister factor. Italians have turned away from square meals to snacks at the same time that they have been leap-frogging Brit-ain in terms of GDP. The British contest some of the figures, but in Italy they are confident and proud that the Nineties have seen them trumping Britain in economic terms for the first time since the days of Imperial Rome.

The sorts of people who measure national prosperity simply by GDP are also the sorts who neglect to eat properly. Their ascendancy has meant that the Italians have microwaved their quality of life for a higher position up an economic league

"It's chaos, above all mental chaos." Michele Carruba, a leading Italian nutritionist, told La Stampa, "We are losing a very healthy alimentary tradition based on carbohydrates, protein and a variety of vegetables - the old emerged with a more sophisticated fast- tradition of 'a food for every day' gnocchi on Thursday, fish on Friday and so on." Neuroses, he adds, are spreading as a result.

The food mood in Britain is quite the reverse. For many years, the British sat at the feet of the impossibly haughty French chefs and their alchemy which created such incredible sauces, roux and pastry. It took Italy to alert us to the fact that our French fixation had yielded little more than the crèpe suzette, a showy, sugary, banal concoction, as redolent of the 1970s as Ford Capris.

From pizzas and pasta ar one end to Elizabeth David and the River Café Cook Book at the other, Italy was the most important influence in teaching Britain about the importance of quality over quantity of ingredients, elegant simplicity in presentation over pointless elaboration.

Italian food freed us from Gallic hegemony with the lesson that in food as in modernist architecture, form followed function. Use decent ingredients and they will look and taste right with minimal adornment. The trickery of French cooking was a con trick. Pasta, pesto, parma ham and parmesan were simple, unembarrassable foods. Restau-rants soon had to keep up with their increasingly demanding customers.

Since 1990, Italian food exports to this country have gone up by more than 40 per cent. Britain is among the biggest wine-drinking countries in Europe. London is said to possess some of the finest Italian restaurants in the world, Italy included. Italians, whether businessmen, footballers or diplomats, say it is easier these days to live la dolce vita in London than in Rome or Milan.

To learn that real Italians are now rushing home to eat pre-packaged, flavour-enhanced lasagne al forno is like finding out that a model schoolmistress has taken to eating with her fingers and telling filthy jokes.

For they would not be there among the Barbour-clad rat-racers of Venice or Turin but farther north, among the easy, contented full-bellied people of Britain. "Nunc est bibendum," he would say, between mouthfuls of honey-roasted dormice. "Not bad for a bunch of barbarians."

A shiver runs through the middle classes as they prepare for a mild flagellation. Chief Rabbi had already thundered his new moral autocracy. The Bishop of Liverpool, the Right Rev David. Sheppard, on Monday gave the unemployment debate his usual left-arm spin. Asked whether it was right to intervene in politics, he said that "underneath social and political issues lie spiritual truths ... politicians are not the only people who can bring about change."

Then on Thursday came Dr Carey's moment. "Trust has suddenly become a significant electoral word," he wrote, "and properly so ... Our society has become morally reticent, even inarticulate." He protested at the "popular cultural assumption that to try to define something as good and right in an absolute sense is an unwarranted and potentially oppressive incursion" on the private domain.

If I were to rewrite election law I would ban the word morality from the campaign. I would ban its derivatives, morals, moraliser, immoral and very good election needs a "remoralise", and exile to a hermit's cell bishop. As the argument gets all who broke the rule. Pulpit cliches and parsonical platitudes are one thing. Like parsonical platitudes are one thing. Like 30-second phone-ins, party politicals and vapid manifestos, they are the background static of an election. But giving a moral overlay to an argument about policy is more than that. It seeks to add a magic ingredient to help that argument on its way.

In the case of Wednesday's Council of Churches' report on unemployment, the purpose was unmistakable. If Labour will not speak up for the poor, then the the Archbishop of Canterbury who felt churches will. The report called for higher taxes on the rich, a national minimum wage, more rights unions and a shorter working week. The report implied that higher redistributive taxes were a moral virtue and protested at the "moral indignation of the rich over the dishonesty of the poor". From a Labour candidate this would evoke no more than a call from Tony Blair's office. with orders to stand down and accept a peerage in the new Parliament. From a multi-faith church body it carries a protective halo. On presenting the report, Bishop Sheppard was not torn limb from limb by a BBC arm-wrestler. He was treated with the deference due to the cloth. You do not interrupt a bishop halfway through his first soundbite. The Force is with him.

Bishop Sheppard is an old trooper. He has used his pulpit to win more cash for Liverpool over the years than any other city in Britain. His diocese is an examplar of the public sector dependency he so fervently espouses. If his policies worked, Merseyside would by now be outperforming Silicon Valley. They have not worked. But at least the bishop carries his torch with panache. When Mr Blair reforms local government, he should stand as mayor of Liverpool and test his views on the hustings.

The Archbishop and the Chief Rabbi are treading a more subtle, and thus more dangerous, path. Both seek priority on the political agenda for their favourite policies, especially on education and the family, and do so by claiming that these policies contain a special moral yeast. We are nervous of absolutism, says Dr Carey. The relativist barbarians are at the gates. While Bishop Sheppard wants to make young mothers stay at home to look after their children, the Archbishop wants a shorter national curriculum so "morality" can be taught in school. Other authoritarians are about to ban hunting, tag parents of juvenile delinquents and appoint censors to investigate school books. Who knows where this will lead? The new moral correctness will make its political variety seem tame. I see this as a concerted attempt to derationalise politics. We now have senior clergy variously declaring that a wider tax base, higher tax rates and, by implication, expanding public spending are "moral". They imply that (Tory) efforts to reduce the State are immoral. Higher social security spending is treated as good a priori. Single parenthood is evil. Divorced or separated parents are treated as moral defectives. The tax and benefit system should be changed to reflect this prejudice. From other corners of the same wood we are told that it is moral to incarcerate young criminals in what I (and most other European states) would regard as barbaric conditions. It is moral to hold parents responsible for the crimes of their children and moral to oppose abortion. Morality is considered a "topic" in the school curriculum. Teachers must teach "what is right and wrong" on pain of dismissal. As for debating the reform of drugs laws, try doing so without at some point being accused of the most craven Socratic corruption. Throwing dollops of morality at political arguments is pernicious. I incline to Tom Paine's view, that when two men claim to think alike on ethics they have probably not finished arguing. Of course we have moral sensibilities, and would like them to embrace family, friends, neighbourhoods, even nations. The problem is as old as Plato: how to handle clashes between our "shared values" and those of other individuals and groups.

Dr Carey rests his case for a more interventionist morality on the mere fact that he detects that shared values exist. I am not so sure. If the values are shared, what need have we of episcopal intervention? If they are not shared, whose values are we imposing?

Dr Carey protested in The Times this week that the new curriculum was only going to "describe" shared values. He was concerned not just about what was shared but what the Church believed "should be" shared. Note how easily the moralist slides from announcing a consensus to prescribing one. Dr Carey will doubtless say that I am nitpicking. His words were really ecclesiastical fog. meant as uplifting electoral jollity. Yet Dr Carey, like the Chief Rabbi, is careful to deride "false theories of privatised morality and talk of "a society disfigured by widespread moral confusion". He knows what he is about the extension of state power into the private lives of citizens. Bishops were once less timid about using morality as a political trump card. Guarda il Gran Inquisitor.

ne man's shared values is another's superstitious meddling. I confess to preferring a privatised morality to a nationalised one. I dislike Dr Carey or the Chief Rabbi or the Home Secratary or the Chief Inspector of Schools telling me how to lead my life and bring up my children. And I take the old liberal view that what I dislike being done to me I should not want done to others.

In his book After Virtue, the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre links our "lost comprehension of morality" to the decay of old Aristotelian virtues. The rules of morality, half-remembered fragments of ancient cultures, were often a sub-class of authoritarian politics. Like Dr Carey's shared values, they were to be obeyed because I say so". They were bound to wither in the sun of liberty. But what to put in their place? MacIntyre's answer was democracy, "the construction of local forms of community, within which civility and the intellectual and moral life can be sustained". This layered democracy should still sit in watch over the authoritarians of the Right and the libertarians of the Left - nowadays sometimes vice versa. A democracy settles all its disputes by treating them as political. Treat them as moral and the result is war.

Reducing unemployment, helping children out of poverty, handling drugs or countering crime can move us to passion, anger and moral outrage. If I hold any creed in this matter, it is that only democracy can resolve them. If there is confusion in Britain, it is caused by the decay of democratic institutions. Moral supremacy is for escapists. But for the moment, democracy has the floor. Give it a break, and let the bishops return to their cells.

WONDROUS THINGS

Mankind, magma and the limits of life in the solar system

In the middle of an election campaign it is particularly difficult to maintain a proper sense of proportion. A decade from now it may be obvious that the most significant event of April 1997 occurred in deep space, not a marginal constituency. The issue that dominated the party political press conferences yesterday was Europe. The ques-tion worth wider consideration is the implications of Europa.

Europa has played an important part in the path of human thinking for much longer than might be imagined. It was Galileo who, in 1610, first identified the largest moons of Jupiter, including Europa. The moment had a profound impact upon him. He had, he declared, seen "wondrous things" in the heavens. From that point he could not accept that the Earth was at the centre of the universe. That controversial view swiftly switched from heresy to orthodoxy.

Now a spacecraft named after the great 17th-century scientist has made what might prove an ever greater discovery. The pictures of Europa transmitted back by Galileo suggest that the surface of that distant place might sustain some form of existence. It certainly seems at least as strong a candidate as Mars, where a similar revelation caused a sensation last summer.

That belief stems as much from Earth as Europa. In recent years it has been postulated that life on this planet evolved from the bottom of the ocean. Liquid magma, warm and rich in chemicals, forced through to the sea floor, provided the preconditions for evolution. Those circumstances would appear to be matched on Europa. Nasa's photographs imply that the moon holds a deep ocean beneath a crust of ice alongside ample volcanic activity. If so, bacteria or other simple organisms could have developed. At present this is little more than supposition. It relies entirely on an extremely limited body of evidence. A lot depends on whether what appear to be "icebergs" floating in a form of "sea" on Europa's surface stand up to further analysis. Validation will require much more exploration. As the distances involved are vast -Galileo was launched over seven years ago we will not be able to test the theory until the first decade of the next century.

The endeavour is clearly worth the effort. Proof would transform much of what we have assumed from astronomy to theology. The fundamental purpose of our presence in space has always been as much what we would find out about ourselves as what we would discover on distant planets. There could be nothing more profound than life of any type - not thousands of light years away but on our planetary doorstep.

That knowledge, though, will not come without a reordering of priorities. Since the 1960s politicians and the public have placed by far the greatest weight on manned exploration. Missions such as the Galileo probe have occupied a more modest place in funding. The relative scientific value of the two is rather different. Until the Voyager programme it was widely assumed that all the satellites of the outer planets were frozen cold and essentially similar. We have since found that there is enormous, unanticipated, variation to be found in our solar system. More has been learnt in the last 30 years than the whole of previous history.

The pressure of competing claims on Earth makes a vast increase in space expenditure improbable. Simply avoiding substantial cuts will require intense international co-operation. If our understanding is to be advanced then a renewed emphasis should be placed on unmanned exploration. That information will allow for far more ambitious manned activity later. In the past probes such as Voyager have captured mass attention for a week and then disappeared into oblivion. If the clues provided by Galileo can be confirmed, then this small metal messenger will be with us forever.

LABOUR TREMORS

Meanwhile back here on Earth the big question was . . .

Did Labour wobble this week? Conservative election spokesmen, sensing an unaccustomed vulnerability in the Opposition, lost leaders, unused to the whistle of weaponry. Mr Major is experienced at fighting apparhave been slow to recover.

Mr Blair's first campaigning mistake was to rush to endorse the Tories' planned privatisation of the air traffic control system only weeks after his spokesmen had ruled it out. The policy may be a good one. Its adoption may have been dictated by a zealous determination to account for every penny of planned public spending. It may in the long run allow him to be more openminded about privatisation. But on the same day as he was campaigning on the issue of trust, the shift made him look shifty.

Politicians always claim that they pay no attention to polls. But when the privatisation row was followed by a six-point drop for Labour and a six-point rise for the Tories in our MORI poli on Thursday, Mr Blair was clearly unnerved and Mr Major markedly cheered. The contrast between the Conservatives yesterday, brimming with bonhomie, and their strained and tetchy press conferences only a week ago was stark.

Yet the week did not go entirely the Government's way. It started with Neil Hamilton being adopted in Tatton, and Martin Bell launching his anti-corruption campaign. Then the Institute for Fiscal Studies confirmed Labour's claim that the tax burden has increased. By yesterday divisions over Europe, which had been buried for three weeks, began to re-emerge. The change in the perception of success lay in the reaction of the two leaders. Mr Major, Blair was close to cracking up. Discounting get better. The polls are beginning to the intergalactic rhetoric, it was certainly marrow. Defeat on May I has already been true that Labour's previously impregnable discounted, but every point in the rolls that veneer has taken a battering and that has already been true that Labour's previously impregnable discounted, but every point in the rolls that veneer has taken a battering and that its "he gains will be seen as a personal victory.

> Mr Blair may be some 20 points ahead. but for him the campaign is far more difficult. He knows that he will be blamed for every drop in the polls. He is still a novice at electioneering, and seemed unprepared for the fierceness of the onslaught when it came.

Labour's policies are being the more rigorously scrutinised because Labour is the more likely next government. The campaign leadership may not like it but this is inevitable and right. Until recently the imbalance was in the other direction; it is now Labour's turn to be tested under fire.

Mr Blair has a strong character that should be able to withstand such treatment. But he is allowing himself to be corraled to such an extent that he appears defensive, even rattled. He should break out from the constraints laid down by his aides and allow his normal personality - confident, witty, self-deprecating and expansive -- to reassert itself. A head-to-head debate with Mr Major. as we set out in our Times challenge yesterday, would be the perfect opportunity. If Labour is slow to come to the table, Mr Blair's controllers will have won.

BRAVO, POP MAESTRO

Music should be a public ocean not a private swimming-pool

The barricades of elitism that hinder the mass appreciation of classical music are being breached once more. This week two instrumental virtuosos, on opposite sides of the Atlantic, experienced triumphs of a particularly encouraging nature.

In America the trumpeter and composer Wynton Marsalis — whose mastery of classical and jazz styles is a wonder of the age - has won the Pulitzer Prize for his three-hour oratorio about American slavery, Blood on the Fields. Marsalis is following the route pioneered by Gershwin 70 years ago: having recruited a vast following through his genius in popular genres, he is now enticing them. Pied-Piper-style, into more challenging areas. No wonder that the New York Philharmonic and other American orchestras have commissioned works from him. Their greying audiences desperately need the regeneration that his young, ethnically diverse fans can bring.

Meanwhile in London on Thursday the British violinist Nigel Kennedy returned to playing classical music in public after a fiveyear absence. He was in magnificent form. but that was not the only reason for celebration. Defying every stuffy "rule" of programming, he interlaced Bartok's Sonata for Solo Violin — a savage masterpiece that would normally empty a concert hall at 50 paces - with a succession of dazzling Jimi Hendrix arrangements. Such was the mesmerising quality of his playing that an audience of 3,000 was transfixed. Few classical soloists share Kennedy's empathy with vintage rock music, just as few jazz musicians have the confidence to strike up relationships with orchestras. That only makes their achievements more admirable. Regrettably, however, both have been targets of purist sneers, accusations that they are vulgarising their art-forms and betraying their true constituencies in search of wider fame. The reverse is true. It is the musicians who lock themselves into ivory towers who are jeopardising the future of serious musicmaking.

In missionary work nothing succeeds like charisma: the magnetic personality who can inspire millions. Bernstein was such a figure; his easy transitions between Broadway and Carnegie Hall convinced a generation of American music lovers that they could do the same. Beecham had the same populist instinct. He would have applauded the principle of mixing Bartok and Hendrix: he did much the same thing himself, albeit with music of a gentler hue. Kennedy and Marsalis are their spiritual successors. In some quarters of the musical establishment they will always be regarded with hostility. But the cheers in the Festival Hall on Thursday, and in the Barbican last month when Marsalis premiered his stupendous oratorio, confirmed that they are both engaged in something of huge importance to our cultural life. Encore, maestros.

Blair, unions and the bill to be paid

Blair and Gordon Brown is not in question. The real issue new Labour presents is not one of integrity but of credibility. Despite internal differ-ences, the party has been able to pre-sent a united front to the public, at nearly all costs, in the interest of gaining power. Internal critics, silent at present but I suspect privately incensed, are well aware that voicing opposition to policies could cost new Labour the election.

They are well aware, too, that once victory has been achieved the need for such discipline will disappear. Public as well as private pressure can then be brought to bear on a government, free at last of election pressures but dependent nevertheless on the cooperation of powerful interest groups within the party for success in implementing economic policy.

Trade union leaders have dismissed accusations that they are shunning major public appearances to avoid clashes with Labour (report, April 4). But having contributed substantially to new Labour's election expenses, unions will undoubtedly "send in the bill" if Labour gains power. In doing so they may again make Britain's Government as powerless as in the chaotic days of Harold Wilson and James Callaghan.

Trade unions are centres of power in their own right; power which can be applied with particular force to Labour in office. They have their own agenda quite separate and distinct from that of new Labour.

is it not, in these circumstances, entirely legitimate to question whether assurances that new Labour would in fact be able to deliver the Conservative policies now adopted are really credible, or whether the roadblock of trade union opposition would not ultimately be reimposed.

Yours faithfully. DENIS DODĎS, Corners, 28 Grange Park, Westbury on Trym, Bristol.

From Dr Geoffrev M. Seeff

Sir, Following the report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies on Labour's plans for a windfall tax farticle. Business, April 10), it is abundantly clear what the Labour Party is really saying to utilities: "We want £5 billion. We have no rational basis for assessing you for additional tax but hand it over, otherwise our regulator could make life extremely difficult for you."

The utilities are big and bad enough to look after themselves. However, is the electorate of this country seriously thinking of putting into government a party whose sole policy for raising additional revenue is redolent of methods used in 1930s Chicago?

Sir. Mr R. M. Matheson (letter, April 4) should know that Gordon Brown has already stated that he will not increase the basic rate of income tax. Therefore Mr Matheson cannot look forward to 22 tax cuts, as it was only the imposition of the 22 rises which made it possible to reduce the basic Tory Chancellors believe (justifiably. I am afraid) that the only tax concept which most of the electorate can comprehend is the comparatively unimportant basic rate of income tax.

From Mr David M. Evans

Sir. Today you report that Tony Blair's neighbour. Ms O'Rourke, does not begrudge the Blairs' decision to abandon the local school system in Islington and send their boys to a grant-maintained school in Fulham. As a parent I do not begrudge the Blairs' decision, but the stench of hypocrisy does choke me. Mr Blair, it seems to me, has spent his political career trying to deny other parents the choice which he enjoys. I only hope that when the Blair children grow up they will have the honesty to thank John Major rather than their father.

Yours sincerely, DAVID M. EVANS, The III Tuns. St Nicholas, South Glamorgan.

From Mr Rajnikant J. Mehta Sir, After his support for privatisation. the only thing Mr Tony Blair needs to do now is to change the name of his party to "new Conservative" and perhaps a few of us may reconsider our

To be fair, some parties have announced their willingness to meet one or two of these points, but it is because the political classes have shown their inability to take action against the problems which the report defines that many of our people have become profoundly sceptical about the state of politics in this country.

Mass unemployment leads to widespread exclusion from social life and undermines social cohesion, our support for one another. If the Churches can see this, why can't the politicians? I hope that British electors, including churchpeople, will question all the candidates about these issues and make it plain that they expect a concerned response.

This is a great pity. This excellent exhibition, coupled with the recently published book by Anna Pakula, The Uncommon Woman, gives a fascinating insight for this generation into a royal marital alliance which tragically did not produce the international accord hoped for. Even the KG and a field marshal's baton did not stop Vicky's son, Wilhelm II, waging war on his grandmother's countrymen and women.

I believe it of vital historical importance that arrangements be made for the exhibition and its remarkable objects, many lent by the Queen, to be shown on this side of the Channel. I am convinced that it would show seepties that, for all the criticism, the European Union is a more hopeful 20thcentury means of cementing mutual aspirations than the royal arrangements of the 19th century.

For a comparatively modest capital outlay a compact, high-performance, beautifully designed and engineered means of transport, fully air-conditioned, can be his. It will outperform his fourwheeled machine in almost every way, not least in pure pleasure.

Furthermore, ownership gives admission to a delightful club, and even here two wheels excel: not only the friendly wave (left-handed) and the flashing of lights, but also the biker's nod. The one possible deficiency is that not many of this friendly club are women. A pity.

Sir. I suggest that if Mr Mendes wishes to drive a car with character and also enjoy the camaratlerie of likeminded motorists, he should buy a Morris Minor. My 1969 model is a suitable vehicle for a driver of any age and is easily capable of maintaining adequate speeds to keep up with modern A-road traffic.

Journeys are regularly enhanced by exchanging waves with fellow owners, although we rarely flash headlights - these cars were built before the now ubiquitous column-mounted flasher was considered necessary and, in any event, is a wave not a more suitable and personal greeting?

Colour version of "The Longest Day"

From the Director of the British Film Institute

Sir. I wonder if any of your readers saw the screening of The Longest Day on LWT on Sunday afternoon? As far as I know this was the first time that a "colourised" feature has been shown on UK terrestrial television . Interestingly, LWT had been careful not to publicise this premiere. All publicity, including their press release for the transmission, announced a normal black and white showing. Besides the hideous overall look of the film the colouring led to some memorable howlers such as Leo Genn (who was playing a high-ranking Army officer) wearing a blue RAFcolour uniform. Is it not unfortunate that the floodgates should be opened just two weeks after Fred Zinnemann's death (obituary, March 17), bearing in mind his long-standing fight against this pro-cess becoming commonplace in Britain? I hope others who feel strongly about this will write to the broadcasters. Yours sincerely, WILF STEVENSON, Director. British Film Institute, 21 Stephen Street, WI.

Honourable discharge

Sir, My former parliamentary colleague, Sir William van Straubenzee, who urges (letter, April 8) that Members of Parliament should be accorded the title "MP Emeritus" on retirement, has overlooked the benevolent provisions of the Rehabilitation of Offend-

HENRY HYDE

Henry Hyde. American wartime spymaster, died in New York on April 5 aged 81. He was born in Paris on October 31, 1915.

New York lawyer descended from the founder of the Equitable Life Insurance Company. Henry Hyde has his place in military history as the organiser of the "Penny Farthing" spy network which made such a contribution to the success of the Allied landings in the South of France. His birth in Paris to American parents whose social circle touched espionage, fashion, art and the military world, was of inestimable advantage when, in 1942, he was recruited by Allen Dulles for the Office of Strategic Services (forerunner of the CIA) to organise the Allied espionage penetration of southem France. The result was the establishment of an unusual intelligence network which embraced both French aristocrats and anarchists, as well as many shades of political opinion in

It was to provide detailed information on German troop movements in southern France which was of invaluable help to the US Seventh Army in its advance from the French Riviera up the Rhone valley in the summer of 1944. Penny Farthing intelligence also gave material assistance to the D-Day landings by locating the Das Reich division before it was able to move northwards to join in the battle for the Normandy beachhead. Hyde's exploits are recorded in Joseph Persico's book Piercing the Third Reich and in Wild Bill Donovan by Anthony Cave

Born in Paris, Henry Baldwin Hyde grew up in Versailles. His father, James Hazen Hyde, was an ardent Francophile who spent more than forty years in France and seldom returned to the US. At his home he entertained a large and glittering circle which included the Allied Commander in Chief. Marshal Foch. Hyde's mother, Marthe Leishman, ran a salon which was frequented at various times by Ravel. Cole Porter, the painter Marie Laurencin and the society beauty Misia Sert (herself the wife of the Spanish painter José-Maria Sert).

Hyde was educated in France, England and Germany and became fluent in French and German. In France he attended the Collège de Normandie and then went to Chillon College in Switzerland. In England he was educated at Charterhouse before going to Trinity College, Cambridge, to read history. He then went for a period to Bonn University before returning to America to study at Harvard Law School. But he arrived back in America having developed, from his continental education, what Anthony Cave Brown that was rare in American society." He was already a natural candidate for the OSS role he was later to fulfil.

He was in practice in the law in New York when he was recruited into the OSS by Allen Dulles, himself a lawyer. Hyde was sent to Algiers where, after a period doing routine desk work he became responsible for collecting intelligence about the movement of German forces in southern France, with an eye on the "Anvil" invasion which was to complement the Normandy landings (when it actually happened it was renamed, less impressively. "Dragoon"). He was told to recruit, brief and equip agents, to select dropping points and to co-ordinate communications between the spies and the OSS in Algiers. "Penny Farthing", as this operation became known, was always reckoned by the OSS to be its most successful wartime effort.

That it was so, was largely due to Hyde's knowledge of France and the French psychology and to his willingness to embrace unusual solutions to has described as "a Cartesian mind problems. Thus, his espionage team went ashore at landing points between Cannes and Toulon on August 15, 1944, they were unusually well acquainted with the dispositions of their opponents and sustained incredibly light losses: 94,000 men and 11,000 vehicles were landed with fewer than 200 casualties. As a result of this Allied awareness, the defending German 19th Army received a severe mauling before it was able to extricate itself and retreat north. Thereafter, the advance was eased at every step by the flow of intelligence available to it, as well as by the harassing efforts of the French Resistance in the South (not to mention the fact that its victorious path lay through some of France's finest wine country). General Alexander Patch, who commanded the US Seventh Army, was later to congratulate the head of the OSS, Major-General Donovan, on the "extraordinary accuracy of the intelli-gence that Penny Farthing had elivered to him. Yet one of Penny Farthing's most signal intelligence leats bore not upon the Franco-American advance in the South but on the earlier Normandy battle. This was the discovery of the presence of the SS Panzer Division Das Reich in southwestern France when it was thought to be in action on the Russian front. The detection by a Penny Farthing agent of this very powerful unit in a position where it could be rushed northwards to menace the Allied breakout in Normandy was a great intelligence coup and gave Allied tactical air force and French guerrilla commanders time to prepare plans to disrupt its march when the time came for it to move. The upshot was that the Reich division was harried by air strikes and guerrilla ground attacks all the way from the Bordeaux area to Normandy, where it arrived far too late to affect the outcome.

At the end of the war Hyde was awarded the Croix de Guerre and made an officer of the Legion of Honour by a grateful French Govern-ment, while the US Government awarded him two Bronze Stars. After VE-Day, Hyde replaced Dulles as OSS chief in Switzerland, remaining in the post for two years before returning to the US where he practised international law for two leading New York law firms until his retirement in 1990. Aside from his professional work, he was a president of the Veterans of the OSS and was also a vice-president of the French Institute/Alliance Francaise. In the latter capacity he was able to continue his work for better Franco-American understanding.

He is survived by his wife Liza, whom he married in 1961, by two daughters from a previous marriage to Marie de LaGrange, and by two But by the time he was taken, the damage to German military prospects stepdaughters.

LAURA NYRO

Laura Nyro, American singer and songwriter, died from cancer on April 8 aged 49. She was born on October 18, 1947.

THE boundaries of pop music were expanded a little and forever by the eccentric, late Sixties figure of Laura Nyro. A Bronx native, Nyro sang about tough, urban environments in a voice which could sweep from soft, whispery anguish to operatic bravura in a single phrase. "Gentle as a razor-blade" was how one critic described the disconcerting effect, in that womendominated, introspective school of songwriting she was second only to Joni Mitchell and Carole King.

As a singer, her popularity never reached far beyond the Haight Ashbury hippies. But as a songwriter, she made stars of many of her contemporaries: And When I Die frecorded by Peter, Paul and Mary and Blood, Sweat and Tears); Eli's Coming (Three Dog Night); Wedding Bell Blues (the Fifth Dimension): and Stoney End (Barbra Streisand). Stoned Soul Picnic alone was recorded by 60 other artists, including Aretha Franklin and Frank Sinatra. Nyro, too, might have had hit singles had she been prepared to make slight cuts to her album tracks - to which she would never agree.

Unlike some contemporaries such as Janis Joplin she survived the temptations of exotic stimulants and got out in time to save her health and sanity. In 1972, after returning from a tour in Japan, she retired with her carpenter husband to a small fishing town in Massachusetts. The marriage did not last but the retirement did - bar the occasional new album and flurry of media interest.

Laura Nigro, as she was christened, was brought up in the musical melting pot of the Bronx, and influenced by her Spanish and black neighbours, her Italian father who tuned pianos for a living and played jazz trumpet, and her Jewish mother who worshipped Debussy. She wrote poems and songs from the age of eight in a prolific if undisciplined manner and at Manhattan's High School of Music and Art was given a solid grounding in piano and composition. At night she sang in subway stations with a neighbourhood harmony

Though her voice had been trained to sing opera, she never really got beyond a minority appeal as a singer; her main contribution was to be as a songwriter. Her best-known song, And When I Die, was recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary when she was only 17 (Blood, Sweat and Tears later also had a hit with it). By then Nyro was well-established as a folksinger, with her long skirts, her centre-parted black hair flowing down to her guitar, and her sloe-black eyes trained on the audience as she walled through her compositions. The success of And When I Die led to an invitation to appear at the Monterey Pop Festival in 1967. But, against the psychedelic atmosphere and the high voltage rock of Jimi Hendrix, Nyro seemed out of place. She had chosen to wear a grotesque black wedding dress and to stage a Motown-style revue, and she was booed off stage. Nyro, who always spooked easily, was so wounded that she avoided performing in public again for several years.

Her first album, More than a New Discovery (1966) showed off her sophistication as a songwriter. Her new manager David Geffen ensured her a free creative hand in the studios of her next recording company. Columbia Records for the second album. The result was Eli and the Thirteenth Confession (1968), an emotional account of a young woman growing up, which influenced a whole generation of women songwriters - not just her immedi-women like Kate Bush, Rickie Lee Jones and Suzanne Vega. Three more albums followed, and her one brush with the pop charts - a version of the Drifters' Up on the Roof in 1970. The 1971 Gonna Take a Miracle album was a tribute to the old New York street standards of Motown and doo-wop.

Then came her early retirement, ended by the album Smile (1976) which she went on the road to promote. Now eight months pregnant and radiantly healthy, she seemed relaxed to be back on stage. She took six years off to bring up her son but was back on the touring circuit in the 1980s.

Nyro had found that only artists like Bob Dylan could withdraw so completely from their audience and then be accepted back entirely, no matter what musical direction they had decided to take in the interim. The loyal core of fans still turned out to see her Christmas Eve shows in downtown Manhattan and Columbia recently released a two-disc retrospective of her work. But she could no longer be called a pop diva, and immersed as she was in green. issues and Eastern mysticism, she did not seem to miss the mixed blessings and burdens of that life.

Laura Nyro is survived by her son and by her companion, Maria, her marriage having ended in divorce after ate contemporaries but three years.

Dr Richard Robinson, gardener and horticultural hotographer, died on March 27 aged 80. He was born on March 21, inson trained first to be a doctor, but having qualified he turned from medicine to farming. He bought Hyde Hail in 1955 and began running the farm of nearly 1.800 acres. The garden started simply as an elfort to clear up around the farmhouse and outbuildings. The bleak site was an unlikely place to start, but Robinson planted trees and shelter belts to protect the land. Trees and shrubs from mild climates such as California now thrive there. Robinson treated the alkaline soil with aluminium sulphate in woodland areas to make it suitable for lime-hating rhododendrons and other Ericaceae. Hyde Hall is now renowned for its comprehensive collection of plants. Robinson was constantly updating his garden. He had a network of contained personalities as different as the Lyons nobleman Count Jacques de

Rocquefort and the firebrand socialist anarchist Mario Marret (codename Toto"). Between them these men led the Penny Farthing operation on the

the expansion of the Penny Farthing

20, to provide a quite remarkable flow of information to the Aliles. Eventually, after transmitting more than 200 messages to Hyde in Algiers, Toto was captured by the Gestapo in Lyons and horticultural friends with whom he exchanged plants. He built up the national collections of Malus (ornamental crab apples) and Viburnum, and a magnificent collection of roses. Robinson always maintained that his garden merely evolved rather than being carefully planned on graph paper. But this is not the impression it created. The grounds at Hyde Hall are more like a charming series of smaller gardens, than one large one. There is a long herbaceous border with the plants arranged in colour groups. At another turn one is confronted, in May and early June, by a rainbow of irises in what is probably the longest iris border to be seen anywhere. Another unique feature is a large colony of foxtail lilies (Eremurus) naturalised among shrub roses, their spires of flowers rising above the rose blooms. Robinson was also, for many years, the official pho-tographer to the Royal Horticultural Society and a familiar figure at its Westminster flower shows where he photographed the plants that had received awards.

He was custodian of the Harry Smith Horticultural Photographic Collection originally based at Hyde Hall but recently relocated to Wickford near by. This collection of garden and plant photographs is drawn upon by gardening publishers worldwide.

The Royal Horticultural Society awarded Robinson the Gold Veitch Memorial Medal in 1987 for his services to horticulture. The society's honorary fellowship was conferred on him in 1993.

He was twice married. He had two children by his first marriage, one of whom predeceased him. He is survived by his wife Helen.

Alan Gibson, writer and broadcaster, died at literacy and ingeniousness. He was a Dissenting preacher of the old school and in 1959 Taunton on April 10, aged stood for Parliament as the Sheffield on May 28, 1923. Liberal candidate for Falmouth/Camborne. He was at the microphone during the closing overs of the famous Test match against West Indies at Lord's in 1963 when, with an over to go, all four results were still possible. When the commentary team at a Test match consisted of E. W. Swanton as summariser, John Arlott and Gibson, with Brian Johnston providing the merriment, it was the best and most urbane it has ever been. It was the BBC's loss when Gibson was not allowed the same ground rules as Arlott when it came to required stimulation.

Although Gibson saw himself as a broadcaster first and a journalist second, Arlott described him as "quite the most amusing sportswriter of his time". He needed a longsuffering sports editor and was reluctant to come to terms with anything in the way of modern technology; he was not interested in "quotes" or minor records, but he was a delightful daily essayist and brilliant at picking something out from the periphery of a day's play and returning to it until it became a part of his readers' world.

Gibson wrote several books, including an autobiography. A Mingled Yarn (1976). His last four years were spent in a nursing home in Taunton. As well as for The Times he contributed to The Sunday Times, The Guardian, The Speciator and The Cricketer. He is survived by the two sons of his first marriage, to Olwen Thomas in 1948, and the son and daughter of his second to Rosemary King, in 1966. Both marriages were dissolved.

LISZT CONCERTS

We have to record yet two more concerts given in honour of Liszt's visit to this country, consisting entirely of his works and witnessed from beginning to end by the indefatigable composer. The Liszt concert at the Crystal Palace on Saturday included two symphonic poems, Les Préludes and Mazeppa, and the 4th Hungarian Rhapsody, all played by the orchestra under Mr. Manns in such a manner as to evoke the warmest applause of the audience, in which the composer joined. At the same concert a young pianist, Herr Stavenhagen, one of Liszt's favourite pupils and his travelling companion, made his first appearance in the E flat concerto, which he played with sensational brilliancy of execution, and with a refinement of touch and intelligence of phrasing even more remarkable than his technical skill. The two Liszt concertos now under discussion, as, indeed, those previously given, did not introduce a single new work of importance. But the presence of the master was on each occasion

Lize's visit to London was sensational, not least because at the age of 75 he fulfilled a strenuous programme without showing any signs of mental fatigue.

sufficient to fill the hall to the last seat and to rouse the audience to an absolutely frantic pitch of enthusiasm. Ovations such as those offered to Liszt have never before been witnessed in musical England, and for the psychological student it was an interesting phenomenon to see quiet and decorous persons mounting on seats, waving hats and handkerchiefs, and clamouring with unrestrained lung power. Even outside the hall the composer's arrival was always waited for by crowds, who raised their hats to him as if he were a king, and the very cabmen on Saturday were fain to raise a cheer for the 'Habby Liszt. These humble admirers have never heard a note of his music, and would probably not be very much the wiser were they to have that privilege. What impresses them, as with electric force, is the noble face and form and the bearing worthy of a leader of men, and denoting an overpowering personality; and this fact at the same time accounts to a great extent for the phenomenal and uninterrupted success of Liszt's career from his boyhood to his old age. [There follows a list of more than a dozen engagements - concerts, lectures, presentations, conversaziones, and an audience with the Queen - all in the course of one week.] A younger man might well have broken down under this weight of honour and excitement. But Liszt is prepared to brave the fatigues of a second week in London, and has accepted an invitation to be present on Saturday next at yet another concert at the Crystal Palace.

Merrett ordered to repay £600,000

By GAVIN LUMSDEN

MERRETT Holdings has been ordered by the Pensions ombudsman to repay £600,000 that it unlawfully removed from its pension

The ruling by Dr Julian Farrand, the ombudsman, is another major blow for Stephen Merrett, the former dep-uty chairman of Lloyd's of London. In January he was forced to pay £1 million in damages to names who suf-fered losses, and was barred from the insurance market.

Dr Farrand has ordered Merrett Holdings to repay £600,000 of surplus assets it took from one of its company pension schemes five years ago. Mr Merrett said he would appeal but if the decision was upheld it would force him to reclaim the money from his former syndicates to whom it was refunded in 1993. This could bring him into conflict with members of the 1,900-strong Merrett Syndicare 418 Names' Association, who battled for compensation for years after it lost £284 settlement, which protects him from further legal action. Mr Merrett paid El million to the action group and agreed never to work in the market again. Merrett underwriting agencies also promised to pay about £2.2 million to Lloyd's. Mr Merrett resigned as deputy chairman of Lloyd's in September 1993 as fury at names' losses grew. Two years later, in a High Court case, he was accused of "negligence, incompetence and dereliction in his judgment Dr Farrand upheld a complaint by John Bird, a pensioner, and Keith Hulme, the scheme's third trustee, that the trustees had been in breach of trust when they authorised the repayment of contributions back to the Scheme when Abbey National Independent Trustees, the scheme's second trustee and administrator, disclosed that it had a £3.28 million surplus. At the end of April 1993 it obtained the trustees' agreement for a retrospective oneyear contributions holiday. This money was returned to the syndicates who had provided money for the schemes on behalf of Merrett employees working on their behalf. Mr Bird's scheme has only 120 beneficiaries, just two of whom are active, including Mr Merrett. Eighty nine are deferred members and 29 are pany stopped paying contribu-tions into the Merrett Syndi-drawing benefits.

Dr Farrand accepted the delay as the trustees could have granted the holiday in November, but said that returning contributions already made between March and November 1992 was in effect a return of surplus and against scheme rules. He ordered the company to pay back the £600,000 plus interest within Alistair Meeks of Biddle & Co, Mr Hulme's solicitors, said: "The ombudsman's conclusion is consistent with the position adopted by Mr Hulme in relation to the Merrett's repayment as far back as September 1993. Pension schemes are not piggy banks to be raided when times are tough." Mr Merrett said: "This is a considerable surprise. The ombudsman has completely contradicted the interim report he made last month."

The case came to light when Mr Bird and Mr Hulme became concerned with the company's plans to save costs by merging the scheme with another company scheme, the Cree-church Pension Fund. Both funds have assets of around £20 million.

Dr Farrand said that the company's letters to Mr Bird on winding up the scheme had been confusing and misleading. He ordered the company to pay Mr Bird £2,484 for costs incurred in seeking financial and legal advice.

WH Smith parts company with head of retail division

WH SMITH, which has been struggling to improve the per-formance of its main high street chain, has parted company with the head of its retail

Peter Bamford, who has worked at WH Smith for ten years and run the retail side for three, resigned with immediate effect yesterday. WH Smith insisted that he was leaving "by mutual consent" and on amicable terms.

Headhunters have been appointed to find a new managing director of the division, but it is already clear that Bill Cockburn, chief executive. wants to take a more hands-on approach. He has become chairman of the group's retail board and said that the priorities are to improve profitability, sales and customer satisfaction. He emphasised that the strategy for the high street chain is not about to change. He wants the new managing director to bring "fresh-eyes, to drive the business forward". He does not know what Mr Bamford, 43, will do. After Mr Bamford's departure, the retail division is being restructured into three parts. The 100 airport and railway station outlets are being put into a new, separate division with its own manag-

The company declined to give details of the compensation agreed with Mr Bamford, but it is expected to be only a few months' pay. He was on a two-year rolling contract and last year earned £118,000. He also holds shares and options and is part of the non-contributory pension scheme. His received a £400,000 compensation package, including a £150,000 pension entitlement.

By PAUL DURMAN

SIR Clive Thompson, chief executive of Rentokil Initial, the sprawling cleaning and pest control group, was paid £1.23 million last year, a 44 per cent rise on the year before. Rentokil Initial, created by last year's £2.3 billion takeover of BET, is one of the UK's biggest employers, mostly of low-paid workers. Worldwide it employs about 140,000 people. Last year they were paid an average of just over E10,300, according to the company's latest annual report. Sir Clive's bonus rose to £471,000 last year. A spokesman said the bonus was calculated on the same formula that had applied since 1988. Rentokil Initial resisted making an allegedly over-generous payoff to John Clark.

BET's former chief executive. The dispute went to court last October, and a judge awarded Mr Clark £3 million for wrongful dismissal. Last month, the company said that it still intended to appeal. Rentokil Initial only just achieved its regularly restated target for 20 per cent growth in earnings per share. The com-pany, which made pre-tax profits of £318 million last year, maintained its record only because of the contribution from Initial and other businesses acquired with BET. Shares in the group have fallen heavily since last month's results. Rentokil Initial also has businesses providing staff and training, plant hire, security, contract catering and supply-ing trees and plants to deco-

Rentokil Initial | Chaos threatened

BY CHRISTINE BUCKLEY, INDUSTRIAL CORRESPONDENT

ESSENTIAL services such as power, the health service and transport could be thrown into chaos by a computer crisis at the turn of the century, according to an expert advising the

Robin Guenier, head of Taskforce 2000, the agency organising the UK's reprogramming of computer software to recognise the new century, said: We are facing a severe problem that will be bigger than BSE if we don't get to grips with it."

The basic problem is that years have been coded as two digits with the result that 2000 will be treated as 1900 because of the identical zero ending. The work needed to amend this is considerable.

Mr Guenier said a lack of awareness of the problem threatened chaos because computer networks that run utilities, health service organisation and transport systems could malfunction. He gave warning that the cost of reprogramming would be at least £31 billion in salary costs and would need 300,000 extra information technology staff. Most systems will need to be reprogrammed within 17 months to allow time for testing.

"This is an emergency in the same way a war is treated as an emergency," Mr Guenier said. Problems have begun to affect supermarket sell-by dates. After December 31. 1999 all unaltered computerised equipment, including household devices, could fail. Mr Guenier, who became Taskforce 2000 chief last year said the Government needed to take instant action. "We need very senior people to lead this and not delegate things to computer nerds." Ian Taylor, Minister for Science and Technology, said the Government had taken a lead in creating awareness about the problem. He would not endorse Mr Guernier's "It is not possible to be certain of the likely figure until sufficient full audits needed have been completed." The Government is due to complete its own audit by October.

Pound closes above DM2.80

BY GEORGE SIVELL

THE pound closed above DM2.80 for the first time since its ejection from the European exchange-rate mechanism on Black Wednesday in September 1992. At the official Bank of England close the pound stood at DM2.8019, up 1.46

plennigs.
Although sterling's return to grace on the foreign exchanges owes more to the dollar's strength against the mark than to the British economy, the strong pound keeps monetary conditions tight, reducing the need for an interest rate rise.

Such arguments will have helped Kenneth Clarke, the Chancellor, to resist calls from the Governor of the Bank of England on Thursday at the last monthly monetary meet-ing before the election. Yesterday the Bank signalled that base rates were left unchanged at 6 per cent.

The Institute of Directors believes that Britain needs a prompt rise in interest rates to curb inflation pressures. Tim Melville-Ross. Director-General of the IOD, said: "The economic imperatives right now are for a certain amount of activity to be taken out of the economy, either through an increase in interest rates or through a fiscal package of some kind — probably both."

In London shares suffered from American interest rate worries, with the FT-SE 100 index falling 42.5 points to had been up 21 points but dived after figures for retail-sales growth in America were revised up to 1.5 per cent from 0.8 per cent for Februay.

The resulting worries over inflation and further interest rate increases sent the Dow down by almost 100 points in early afternoon trading.

Business disposed to do business with Labour

INDUSTRIAL EDITOR

LABOUR'S election manifesto aimed specifically at industry and services - the first by a political party in Britain — was broadly welcomed by business yesterday.

A number of key business figures endorsed Labour while Britain's leading business bodies maintained their political neutrality but welcomed the focus on business issues that the manifesto offered. Conservative and Liberal Democrat leaders attacked Labour's move.

Launching Equipping Britain for the Future in the City. Tony Blair said: "Labour is now the party for business - the enterpreneurs' champion." All the evidence now showed, he said, that business believed it could work with a Labour government.

Support for Labour came from 84 leaders of small firms in a letter to The Times yesterday. many of whom attended the Labour manifesto launch. Sarah McCartney, owner of a marketing consultancy, Little Max, told the launch: "Small business can look forward to a successful future with a Labour government."

Gerry Robinson, chairman of Granada, praised Labour's "repositioning" on business as "brilliant", and said: "I can say confidently that business can do business with new Labour. That in my view is one of the healthiest changes in British politics for a very long time." Tim Waterstone, founder of the Waterstone book chain, said: "Labour is good for government, good for business and good for Britain."

Away from the launch, Adair Turner, Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry, said it was "welcome confir-mation" of many of Labour's shifts towards business. The CBI still opposed key policies such as the windfall tax and union recognition. but welcomed Labour's stance on macroeconomic stability, the PFI and personal taxation.

Ruth Lea policy head at the Institute of Directors, said: "There is much in it that we can agree with, particularly on macroeconomic stability", although the loD remained concerned about its public finance targets, the minimum wage and signing the social chapter. But she added: "It's quite incredible how far they have come since the early 1980s when there really was an antipathy to business."

Lyonnaise and Suez take on the world

FROM ADAM SAGE IN PARIS

A FRENCH industrial giant was born yesterday when the utilities group, Lyonnaise des Eaux, confirmed plans to take over Cie de Suez, the holding company.

"Our mission is to conquer the world," said Jerôme Monod, 67, chairman of Lyonnaise. Both boards were meeting last night to agree details of the transaction.

The new conglomerate, which is to be called Suez-Lyonnaise des Eaux, will be one of France's five biggest

Thor £1.3m court settlement

TWENTY South African workers yesterday accepted a £1.3 million settlement of their claims for damages and costs lodged in the High Court in London against Thor Chemical Holdings, a British

The workers, who were employed by a South African subsidiary of Thor. were poisoned by mercury at the company's plant in Cato Ridge in Natal. Four severely disabled. The individual damages range up to £100,000.

Albert Dlamini, 30, who received £100,000 and who walks on crutches, said: Working for Thor has de-stroyed my life. I feel very bitter that this British company has come to my couptry and adopted working practices that would never have been accepted in its own country. At least this settlement will allow me to live out the rest of my days in some sort of comfort."

have an annual turnover of about Fr130 billion and a stock market capitalisation of Fr75 The merger, which comes at time when French industry is undergoing sweeping changes, is likely to pave the way for a shake-up in the utilities sector across Europe, including Britain. Lyonnaise owns three British water companies and also has interests in water treatment and waste management in the United Kingdom.

Analysts believe that the decision to focus on four core sectors could herald the sale of Lyonnaise's construction activities, along with the finan-cial and industrial holdings controlled by Suez.

Suez, however, will hold on to its 63 per cent stake in Société Générale de Belgique, the Belgian holding company, which controls Tractebel, the energy and services giant.

The deal ends the independence of Suez more than a century after it was set up to build and run the Suez canal. Gérard Mestrallet, Suez's rich but directionless company into the merger after selling assets such as Indosuez, the investment bank, and its property portfolio. Lyonnaise needs Suez's financial muscle in order to expand abroad. The two boards were expected to approve plans for Suez shareholders to receive 20 Lyonnaise shares for every 41 Suez shares held, as well as sharing special dividend of about Fr3.8 billion.

Although Suez is to be absorbed under a transaction designed to ensure that Lyonnaise need not renegotiate its local government contracts, M Mestrallet, 48, seems likely to emerge as the main beneficia-ry. He was expected to be named as head of Suez-Lyonnaise des Eaux's executive board, with M Monod heading the supervisory council.

Sir David Barnes, head of Zeneca, which is fighting to defend patent protection on its Novaldex anti-cancer drug

US ruling lifts Zeneca's hopes

BY ERIC REGULY

ZENECA has won a court victory that it believes will preserve American patent protection on a top anticancer drug for another five years. The announcement helped to lift Zeneca shares by 35p, to £18.51, within easy reach of their year high of £19.0212.

The US Court of Appeals for the Federal circuit dismissed a challenge to Zeneca's patent on Novaldex, cancer treatment, staged by dex's US patent to remain of £332 million, down 6 per tured by Zeneca.

Novopharm, a Canadian generic drugs company. The ruling affirmed a previous ruling in Zeneca's favour, made a year ago in a US district court in Maryland.

Zeneca, of which Sir David Barnes is chief executive, said that the appeal court dismiss-al will bolster its defences against two other Novaldex challenges, by Pharmachemic BV and Mylan Pharmaceuticals. A third challenge, from Lemmon Company, has been

Irish food firms planning £2.5bn dairy processor

IN DUBLIN

SIX YEARS after merger talks between two of the Republic of Ireland's leading food companies broke down, Avonmore and Waterford are to discuss creating the country's

The new company would have annual sales of about Ir£2.5 billion. It would control 34 per cent of the liquid milk pool in the Republic and would have a dominant pos-

BUSINESS ROUNDUP

GrandMet lines up European disposals

GRAND METROPOLITAN, the food and drinks group, is negotiating the sale of Brossard, its bakery business in France and Italy, to Sara Lee, the American foods group. The sale, which should be finalised within the next two to three weeks, is part of the restructuring of GrandMet's European food business. The aim is to concentrate on main brands, comprising Pillsbury, Green Giant, Hängen-Dazs and Old El Paso.

GrandMet and Sara Lee are to meet French union officials to discuss the impact the move will have on jobs. The sale of the businesses, with turnover of about £92 million last year, is expected to raise about £20 million. Brossard supplies cakes to the French retail market under the Brossard, Gringoire, Savane and Lenotre brand names. It employs about 670 people at three sites in France. Its Italian business, which trades as Fida, also supplies cakes and employs 120 people. Brossard would be managed as a separate unit by Sara Lee/DE. The Netherlands-based division of Sara Lee Corp.

Rowlinson agrees bid

BARLOWS, the property investment and development group, has made an agreed £46.4 million bid for Rowlinson Securities, a rival building and property company. Barlows is offering II shares for every two Rowlinson shares, with a cash alternative of 320p a share. Barlows has irrevocable acceptances in respect of 90.3 per cent of Rowlinson. It is raising up to £5.58 million in a two-for-five rights issue to part-fund the deal. Barlow's pre-tax profits rose 57 per cent to £1.22 million for 1996. A final dividend of 1.55p makes a 2.3p (2p) total.

Test for Antonov gears

SHARES in Antonov, developer of a new-style gearbox, set a 12-month high yesterday as the company confirmed progress in taking its product to market. Chrysler, the carmaker, is to test the gearbox in a prototype model of its Neon range. This could lead to a licensing deal, with Antonov on a 5 per cent royalty rate. Gajra, an Indian gearbox company, has also agreed to produce it. Antonov shares, suspended on Wednesday at 116½ p after jumping 24p, closed at 124p.

Tyco to buy AT&T arm

TYCO INTERNATIONAL, the commercial and industrial manufacturer, has agreed to buy AT&T's undersea telecommunications cable business for about $850 million. AT&T Submarine Systems makes undersea fiber optic relecommunication cable systems. Tyoo, which manufactures disposable medical products, packaging materials, flow-control products and electrical and electronic components, took over ADT, the home security company, for $5.4 billion last month.

A WORKING WEEK FOR: PAUL STREETER

Playing host to millennium merrymakers

Wembley Arena's director is well advanced with his party plans and intends to make it a night to remember, says Jon Ashworth

ON New Year's Eve 1999, fashionable revellers will be flocking to Wembley. the sport and entertainment complex in Thursday northwest London. Friday Thousands of merrymakers are set to pay £250 each for the chance to party the night away, although the precise line-up has yet to be decided. Tickets will be scarce.

The great irony is that the revelries will centre not on Wembley Stadium, scene of Euro 96 triumphs and pop pyrotechnics, but on its smaller sibling, Wembley Arena. Through a cruel twist of timing, the stadium will be closed for construction, pending its genesis into the new National Stadium. The mantle passes to Wembley Arena, reducing capacity at the millennium rave-up from 80,000 to fewer than 12,000. At £250 per ticket, that's a lot of wasted millions.

One man is only too delighted to see the responsibility fall on his shoulders. Paul Streeter, director of Wembley Arena, is well advanced with plans for the evening. only 30 months away, and intends to make it an event to remember. "One of the Streeter, who arrived at Wembley two years ago, takes the problem in his stride. A former computer salesman, he has a job many star-struck teenagers would kill for, regularly meeting famous pop stars, and enjoying an endless round of live con-certs. Diana Ross and INXS are among forthcoming acts.

About 1.5 million people visited the Arena last year, lining the coffers of Wembley pic, the quoted parent company. Operating profits at the Wembley complex increased to £14.1 million (£9.2 million) in the year to December 31, of which nearly £2 million came from the

Non-music events in 1996 included the Horse of the Year Show, the Budweiser Basketball Championships, Gladiators, and Disney World on Ice. Oliver McCall floored Lennox Lewis and Lord of the Dance packed in the crowds. Streeter is one of three executives responsible for Wembley's main areas of business — the Stadium, the Arena, and conferences and exhibitions - and he takes his job very seriously. "I get really proud," he says, guiding me towards the backstage dressing rooms. "This is my building. After a couple of years, it still gives me a real kick."

He takes a hand in negotiations with pop promoters such as Harvey Gold-smith, but leaves most of the work to his sales and marketing team. A second team deals with the operational and technical side. The logistics are daunting, with onsite parking for 7,000 cars, and 150 stewards and security staff. Running the food and beverage outlets keeps a further 70 people busy.

Streeter is there in the background, handing on-the-day control to one of four event managers. Staff work to a general instruction - or G1 - that charts every point of an event down to the minute. Streeter says: "You've got to plan it like a military campaign. Generally, it runs like

The hullabaloo is far removed from Wembley's origins as a leafy destination for Victorian day-trippers. In 1889, Sir Edward Watkin, the chairman of the Metropolitan Railway, dreamt up a scheme featuring football and cricket pitches, and a running track, bucked up with fountains, waterfalls and flower kin's Folly remained a tourist attraction until it was demolished in 1907. With the ending of the Great War, plans were put in hand for a British Empire Exhibition, with the Empire Stadium at its heart. The venue went on to host successive sporting events, including the 1948 Olympic Games. Wembley Arena started life in 1934 as an enormous swimming pool, including a wave machine and other innovations.

It survived as such until the late Fifties when the building was adapted for the concerts that were becoming all the rage. The pool was filled with triangular supports and covered.

Early self-outs included the All Star Record Show of March 1959, with a lineup including Petula Clark, Shirley Bassey, Lonnie Donegan and Vera Lynn. In April 1964, Wembley Arena featured the Beatles and the Rolling Stones on the same billing — rare enough, even then. The Dave Clark Five and the Hollies were among others at the NME poll-winners'

One name from back then, the Monkees, recently returned to Wembley Arena after an absence of 30 years. The critics were not kind, but Streeter, a selfconfessed fan, was ecstatic. "It was my sort of era," he concedes. "It was tremendous having them here after all these years." The group mingled with VIPs and well-wishers at the Silvermint, the Arena's backstage watering hole. Streeter cannot compete with Wembley Stadium when it comes to the headline summer acts - Michael Jackson and U2 are among this year's draws — but wins in terms of year-round consistency. The Arena is an all-weather venue that can be screened off to seat 4,500, creating a more intimate atmosphere. That said, there is no shortage of competition. Earls Court is the bigger London indoor venue, seating 20,000, but tends to hold no more than two or three shows a year.

The NEC in Birmingham has a similar line-up of artists, but tends to feature fewer shows. Big-name acts like to round off their UK tour by "playing Wembley".

The big draws last year included Tina

Turner, who played six nights at the Arena and two at the Stadium, pulling in 220,000 people. Streeter shows me the backstage room where the star relaxed before the show — a rather dowdy affair, with two dubious-looking sofas, and a hifi and television set.

One well-known rocker complained that the CD player was broken, only to discover that he had put the disc in the wrong way up.

Streeter's working week is not made easier by the fact that he lives near Croydon in south London. He is in the office by 7.30 most mornings, beating the traffic, and often stays late to take in the on. It's my building. The hours are long, but I still get a real buzz from it." Only the banking hall and original dome, standing at the core of the building, were suspended in place as the top two storeys were temporarily removed. Through two winters and more than one Lord Mayor's Show, the key site lay wholly exposed to the elements. The Portland stone exterior was scrubbed down, unsightly safety rails were removed, and Ernest Gillick's corner sculpture of Britannia, flanked by Higher and Lower Mathematics, was repaired.

changes. One is certain, the utility tax. The second is probable, an increase in capital allowances to promote investment and the third is possible, the abolition of the dividend tax credit — an easy way of collecting £4 billion. The general view is that Labour will milk the corporate sector to pay for its pledge on personal taxation but Labour could be more radical. It may introduce changes that turn the financing of business on its head.

Labour believes that British companies reinvest too little of their profits and pay out too much in dividends. Increasing the tax allowance on investment in plant and equipment is an obvious step but Labour could go further and adopt proposals by the Institute for Fiscal Studies to change the cost

HOW will Labour tax business if it wins the election? So far, the City is mulling over three of capital for industry. Currently, debt receives a tax subsidy in the form of an allowance against the cost of borrowing. It is an incentive for companies to gear their balance sheets and the consequence has been debt-financed share buybacks and special dividends. Instead, Labour could either remove the allowance against interest payments - a move that would be unpopular as it would hurt small businesses - or, it could introduce a tax allowance for equity, applied to share capital and retained earnings.

The latter has attractions but as Dresdner Kleinwort Benson points out, it could change the shape of the stock market, penalising high-yielding, heavily borrowed low-growth companies while subsidising high-growth companies that reinvest their profits. Another tax on the utilities?

British Telecom

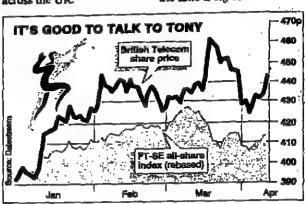

FOR YEARS, British Telecom complained that cable companies were allowed to use their networks for telephony while BT was prevented from using network for broadcasting.

BT could soon get its revenge. Labour said yesterday that it will lift BT's broadcasting restrictions if it wins the election, and the prospect of the company's imminent entry into a vast new business helped to lift the shares. But BT investors should scale back expectations of untold riches to come. Its network, comprised mostly of copper wires, lacks the capacity to handle multichannel television, video-on-demand and high-speed internet access. Building a nationwide network would cost it £15 paying to buy MCI. Ameri-ca's second largest longdistance carrier.

The fledgling cable com-panies were offered the right to sell telephone services as an incentive to invest more than EIO billion in their networks. It would be costly and foolish for BT to replicate the cable infrastructure across the UK.

This does not mean, however, that BT is out of the game. Smaller projects are possible and time may work in BT's favour. The cable highway but they have yet to fill it with paying freight. BT can learn from the mistakes of the cable operators and roll on to the highway when the time is right.

WH Smith

NO ONE expected WH Smith's retail managing director to quit, but, then again. no one was entirely surprised. The high street shops are at the heart of the group. but are also its biggest headache. However good a job the incumbent is doing, the temptation to throw somebody new at the problem is often irresistible.

However, the new head of the division should, in theory, have an easier job. The railway and airport shops and the distribution and logisitics business are being set up as separate divisions, so a successor can concentrate on the

On the other hand, Smith's insists that the change in management does not signal a change in strategy. Also, Bill Cockburn, chief executive, has appointed himself chairman of the retail board and wants to keep a closer eye on the retail side.

This would all be fine if it

RESOURCEFUL people, the Scots. From the country that gave the world Adam Smith, penicillin and television, a new invention is on its way to the Alternative Investment Market: the retractable safe-

At first sight, the device compares poorly with Scotland's other inventions; it looks like little more than a spring tightly packed inside a ball-point pen. However, to its owner - New Medical Technology - it is the future of the $3 billion worldwide syringe market. Its technology is beautifully simple. The needle retracts instantly after injection, thus protecting health workers from accidental pinpricks and avoiding the subsequent compensation claims against hospitals.

Now, why didn't you think of that? Unfortunately, the company is not certain that nobody else has, although it is reasonably confident. While speculative wing-anda-prayer companies are no stranger to the junior exchange, NMT has yet to obtain patent protection. It makes no secret of this absence; indeed, it gives warning that companies with "greater research, development, marketing, financial and personal resources" may get in before it. Whatever NMT may lack investors cannot complain that the company has not protected them from a risky

PENSION TENSION 37

THE TIMES: PERSONAL FINANCE NEWSPAPER OF THE YEAR

n a week in which pension savings were made safer L by new laws, (see page 38) a worrying trend in the management of pension funds was revealed. Pension fund trustees are supposed to have a wealth of options when choosing the manager of the money they guard. The selection is nicknamed "the beauty parade". City firms pose before them in a bid to show they are the financial equivalent of Miss Venezuela.

According to new research, however, the candidates are

abour's utility tax is an obsolete wheeze to grab privatisation pro-deceds without selling anything. On two occasions such a tax might have been justified. One was in 1991-92, when some utilities benefited from falling inflation because of the structure of price controls. Had Labour won in 1992, it could have pounced. By now, any gain has been drowned in all the water flowing under the regulatory bridge.

The second was in 1995-96, when takeover protection was lifted from electricity and water companies. The City demanded heavy cash payouts in addition to normal dividends from companies deemed able to borrow heavily, and there were big takeover premiums. Billions were disgorged that neither the selling Government, nor buying investors, had thought to be surplus at privatisation.

Kenneth Clarke could have pocketed E5 billion on that basis. He chose not to, because that would rewrite sales contracts on a one-way basis. Government offered no compensation for changing the law to the detriment of British Gas and confiscating a lot of its business.

Even the 1995-96 bonanza has swiftly become history. Nearly all regional electricity companies and two water groups have been taken over, mostly minus their surplus cash. It is cynical to penalise new shareholders, or somehow pretend that a levy hurts boardroom fatcats. Labour relies, however, on revenue from the only tax impost it has presented to the electorate. So a levy there would be. The issues are how much, who pays and on what basis. Inspired reports that

Tony Blair wants to levy "only" £3-5 billion sent City traders out buying on Thursday. That looks a dangerous game, though useful for those of us small investors who still want to sell. Utilities have some bargaining power. ven the legal wrinkles of such a tax. but fiscal pressures on the next government grow by the minute. The wider the levy is drawn, the less the individual pain and the less likely it is to suffer legal challenge. This is the slim case for drawing in BAA and buoyant newcomers such as Railtrack. Including generators looks pragmatic but has

Unlike banks in 1981, however, utilities have no common basis to levy a tax. As the Institute for Fiscal Studies concluded, any regime will be unfair between past and present shareholders. and between companies. A levy based on either sales, profit margins or return on capital would discriminate unfairly between industries of widely varying character. Any attempt to define excess profits is doomed to endless dispute. Regulators might dredge their files for the profits they projected when they set price limits, but that would only apply to profits earned after the first price review. For most utilities, there are no valid local or international comparisons. Any a priori definition of "normal" profits would be subjective and would come back to haunt its champions.

The only solid factual basis for allocating the tax burden is to measure returns to shareholders. These include dividends, capital growth and one-off payouts, which could be compared with returns on the FT-SE 100 share index.

That is not fair either. Management of Wessex Water boosted returns via a successful venture into waste disposal. Most small BT investors bought stock from government in the second and third tranches and have fared badly. The biggest gainer from early outperformance was the Treasury. And why should acquirers be taxed on takeover premiums? Yet such an approach looks the least unfair. It should focus the tax on regional electricity and water companies that have yielded the highest unexpected returns and spare British Gas, whose shares underperformed.

To that end it is vital that "excess" returns be measured right up to the present day. If the calculations are cut off in 1995, as in the IFS exercise, electricity companies are heavily favoured at the expense of Gas and BT. If up to date, electricity and water pay most of the tax.

nearer the stock market this week, with the announcement of arrangements for those who wish to sell and for those who wish to keep their shares.

The share education programme designed to help firsttime investors deal with the intricacies of the stock market follows in two weeks. The society's eight million borrowing and saving members who are to receive free shares will be notified of their allocation at the end of this month, or early in May. Halifax has its market debut in June.

Early indications suggest that as many as 750,000 customers will wish to sell their shares on the first day of dealing. For this group, the Halifax is offering a special share dealing service which will be free for the first ten days after flotation. Initially this service will operate by post for sales, but telephone dealing will be introduced.

Those who want to buy more shares will be able to do so, via the telephone, from the first day after flotation. They will have to pay a minimum dealing commission of £12.50 or 0.5 per cent. Selling shares after the ten-day free dealing period will attract a minimum charge of £7.50 or 0.5 per cent.

Because the Halifax is eager to keep as many of its share-holders as possible and would be happy to see them acquire more shares, it is providing various options to promote

Halifax Shareholder Account, the simplest alternative for those who wish to sell some but not all of their shares or to buy more. As this will be a nominee-type account, investors will not get their own share certificates, leaving them without the traditional proof of ownership, However,

Those who do not want to hold their shares in this way can apply to have share certificates. They can also keep their shares in a single-company personal equity plan (Pept. If the shares are held in the single-company Pep, then the member can invest the other £6,000 of their general Pep allowance with another Pep manager. As the shares are deemed to have no transfer value, they can also invest a further £3,000 in Halifax shares, and benefit from the breaks on a single company Pep (see page 32). Ms Concan-non added: "Single-company Peps may not be suitable for everyone. Non-taxpayers or those on a lower rate of tax may not benefit from taking out this sort of Pep.

If share certificates are opted for, then the member will not be able to use the Halifax share dealing services. Instead, they will have to go through another broker. Sharelink, the execution-only broker, charges a minimum of £10 on its nominee account.

As its flotation date of April 21 is less than ten days away, the 2.4 million members of the Alliance & Leicester should have now decided whether to sell their shares, put them in a Pep, or the corporate nominee account or opt to have their own share certificates. The shares of those who missed yesterday's deadline for returning allocation forms will be held with the society await-

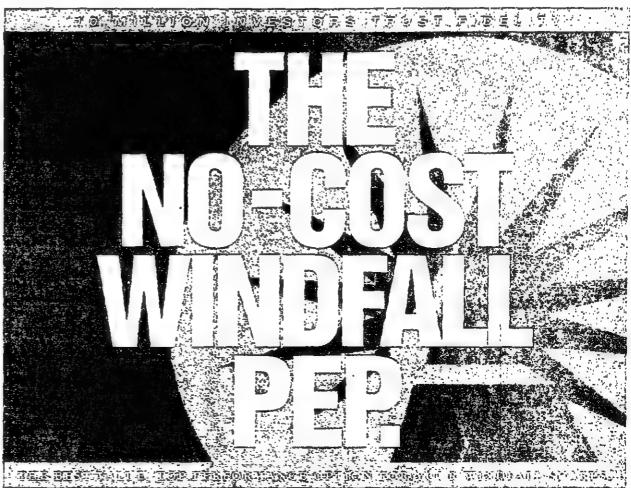

SHOULD YOU SELL OR HOLD?

Brokers advised those with Alliance & Leicester shares to hang on to them, unless they had debts or other outstanding financial commitments. For example, the interest on the outstanding credit card bill, which rings up at about 23 per cent, is unlikely to be matched by any return that could be generated by the Alliance & Leicester. The small number of shares allocated may not be cost-effective to hold. Jeremy Batstone, of Nat-West Stockbrokers, thinks A&L shares will be worth keeping because the society could be taken over. "The likelihood of the Alliance & Leicester surviving as an independent entity is about as likely as a second lieu-will have to satisfy their shareholders' needs." He said Abbey National's share of the mortgage market had fallen to 2.5 per cent this year against about 12.5 per cent last year.

Float into tax haven with care

bonanza of 1997 is proving a windfall for the personal equity plan industry. thanks to the Inland Revenue.

In a special concession to the ten million people benefiting from these share distributions, the taxman has declared that any saver or borrower receiving shares when a building society becomes a bank can put them in a Pep within 42 days at "zero value". So. anyone wishing also to invest their full £9,000 annual allowance in Peps may do so.

However, the uninitiated should take care amid the multiplicity of Pep offers. A Times survey shows that many schemes that will be offered to windfall shareholders have pitfails. Anyone, for example, opting to swap their shares for units in a unit trust risks losing that "zero value" concession (see below). Furthermore, although holding shares in a Pep spares them from income tax and capital gains tax. Pep fees may mean that only big windfalls benefit.

For millions of savers, this will be the first time they have considered a Pep. The Alliance & Leicester and the Halifax have announced their Pep options and other converting societies are expected to follow suit

In view of the big opportunity, the rest of the Pep industry has been amazingly slow to offer transfer services to windfall shareholders. Only a few Rep managers are able, or willing, to let people hold shares direct within a Pep although companies such as Virgin are hurriedly talking to regulators and stockbrokers to try to start a service before the A&L issues shares on April 21.

LIKE millions of savers, Jill Hulme is facing the question of what to do with her first shares when Halifax floats on the stock market in June. "Unfortunately, I didn't get round to being a carpet bagger and I am only getting the one set

Still, having had a mortgage with the society for eight years and a 90-day high interest rate account since 1987. Jill, 33, is expecting a windfall of £1,000 to £1,500 in shares. Wanting to put the money aside for a rainy day, Jill read to see what her options were. "I realised it was sensible to shelter the shares within a Pep as it avoids paying income and capital gains tax. However, you have to move quite quickly, within 42 days of receiving the shares."

marketing company in Macclesfield, Cheshire. He recommended Perpetual's General Pep which charges a holding fee of £4 per dividend (£8 a year). "I'll see how they perform and make a decision on whether to sell and convert them into units in a few months' time."

tive fund such as a unit or investment trust."

However, most experts, such as Charles Levett-Scrivener, of Towry Law, believe that demutualisation shares will be boosted by City institutions desperate to buy them. All of the societies, except perhaps the Halifax, may also become takeover targets after flotation if they themselves go on the takeover trail.

Market speculation will further strengthen the price. Mr Levett-Scrivener recommends hanging on for three months. while others suggest a year. Of course, you may look at the sterling performance of Abbey National shares and decide to be a long-term holder.

If you decide to keep the shares, you should avoid single company Peps. These can hold the shares of only one company at a time. You are allowed only one plan a tax year. If you expect further share windfalls, you could be lured into breaching Pep rules by taking out another in the same year, thus losing all the tax breaks. Unlike general Peps, single company Peps inhibit you from diversifying later into collective funds such as unit and investment trusts or lower-risk corporate bonds. "A Pep is not just for flotation, it is for life," Mr Levett-Scrivener says. "A general Pep will give you much more flexibility in years to come."

this week when it said it will offer only a single company Pep to its 8.5 million members. Experts fear that thousands of people may unwittingly break tax law by taking up single company Peps when the Woolwich, the Northern Rock and

per cent dealing tharge of the shares are sold later.

Accounting for cost of Pepping windfall shares

ompanies allowing shares in their general Peps include Fidelity. Henderson Investors. Invesco, John Govett, Johnson Fry, M&G. Mercury. Perpetual, Save & Prosper and Skandia. All have an established track record in managing investment funds and Peps.

Transferring your shares into these providers is free. but there are other charges. With one exception, all are charging a fee for holding the shares in the Pep. Invesco and M&G are levying an annual fee per share set of £15 and £8. Pepping three sets of windfall shares with Invesco would cost £45. In contrast Mercury is charging a flat fee of £15, irrespective of the number of windfalls. Henderson, Perpetual and Skandia are charging £5, £4 and £3 respectively for each dividend paid on the shares. These will be paid twice a year, doubling the price for each share set.

Save & Prosper and Johnson Fry will hold the shares in their Peps free for a year before charging. From next April S&P will collect a £25 annual fee per windfall, which could easily outweigh the tax advantages of staying in the Pep. Johnson Fry will charge 1.5 per cent of the value of the shares. which could soon mount up if you are a multiple share owner. Fidelity will make no charge until April 1999 and will charge £15 if no further investment in its

Charles Fry of Johnson Fry believes that windfall shareowners should consider these charges before transferring into a Pep: "1,000 Halifax shares might vield you £40 each year. If you're paying a £15 fee you might as well have left it

Fidelity, Henderson, M&G, Mercury and Perpetual will sell the shares for free but only if you reinvest the cash in their unit trusts or investment trusts. Fidelity charges £35 if you sell the shares for cash. S&P will levy a 1.75 per cent dealing fee from April 1998. Skandia charges 1.2 per cent now, rising to 1.95 per cent on May 31 next year. However, three of the companies will not allow new investors to hold the shares in their Pep without putting additional money in their funds. Henderson requires £2,000 or £100 per month, S&P a £3,000 lump sum, and Skandia a £1,000 lump sum or £50 monthly savings scheme.

However, John Govett has the highest initial charges on its unit trusts if you do buy their funds: 3.25-5.5 per cent compared with nothing for M&G and Perpetual and 0.3 per cent for Fidelity. Behind these charges there lurks the suspicion that Pep managers have no interest in taking on the burden of managing the shares in the long term.

But Chris Cottrell, marketing director of S&P, is reserving the right to limit the company's offer if the administrative demands become too onerous. S&P was fined £115,000 last year for breaching Pep rules and is fearful of witat could happen in June and July if millions of investors transfer shares in the Halifax. Woolwich and Norwich Union. "We have invested substantially in our Pep administration since last year," he said. "Nevertheless, those of us who have good offers on the table could be absolutely flooded by demand. What are we going to do if we get a million deals?"

Mr Levett-Scrivener recommends focusing on companies with a track record in handling large volumes of shares within Peps. "Perpetual has allowed investors to put privatisation shares in its Peps since 1987, M&G has its investment trusts experience, as does Mercury."

The pick 'n' mix option

A n option for people prepared to take a more active interest in their financial affairs is a self-select Pep run by a stockbroker. Self-select Peps allow you to shelter any number of different shares and unit trusts. You can choose to pay for advice or plan your investments on your own. Although most brokers are offering a free transfer to windfall shareowners, other charges do tend to be higher than general Peps.

Pillings, which is based in Manchester, is charging £6.75 for each dividend and a 1.65 per cent dealing charge, with a minimum of £10.
Killik & Co, is levying £7.50 per dividend and 1.65 per cent on dealing for its Unrestricted Pep. Cater Direct charges a flat fee of £55, while NatWest Stockbrokers collects 0.6 per cent of. the value of the portfolio each year. Alliance &

Leicester is also offering a self-select Pep, managed by Barclays Stockbrokers, although it is quite expensive. On top of a 1 per cent annual management fee, there are dealing costs starting at 2 per cent for trades under £750 and 1.5 per cent for deals up to £10,000.

M atthew Orr, of Killik & Co. said: "If you want to keep your options open, a selfselect Pep will let you hold as many windfall shares as you want. If you want to add a unit trust later, you are not restricted to the funds of just one provider — unit trust groups make their fees from unit trusts and will not want to manage shares for ever. If you want to sell straightaway, you should use the building societies' free selling services."

Trusts target windfalls

A bout 17 unit trust groups are offering to exchange windfall shares for units in their general Peps above the normal £6.000 annual allowance. For new investors, all, except Lincoln, are walving Pep set-up charges. Apart from GT Global and HSBC, these companies require the shares to be worth a minimum amount. If the amount falls short, investors have to supplement it with cash. Bardays Unicorn and Portfolio require £1,000, while chroders is asking new investors to stump up

£3,000 or start a £50 monthly savings scheme. Britannia Building Society, Capel-Cure Myers, Cierical Medical and Legal & General are waiving the cost of selling the shares and the initial charge on their unit trusts. Framlington caters for those who want to keep some of the shares and diversify within financial stocks. Three quarters of the shares have to be exchanged into its Financial unit trust, with the rest held for no fee until April 1998.

But remember. Exchanging windfall shares for units could lose you the benefit of the zero value subscription. Alliance & Leicester's new Capital Growth general Pep will not take shares but is open to members who want to exchange them. This week the society confirmed that it will sell the shares outside the Pep before investing processes in the Pep. This cash sum will count towards your £6,000 limit.

Sell-out of the Century pensioners

The ghastly ghost of Robert Maxwell, a spectre beyond even the imagining of Edgar Allen Poe, is slowly being banished from the consciousness of the nation's Il million company pension scheme members.

The latest step towards this exorcism was taken this week with the implementation of sections of the Pensions Act that make the plunder of funds harder to commit and easier to detect and punish (see page 38). The Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority (OPRA), the new pensions watchdog, now presides over the 200,000 company schemes that hold £600 billion of our savings. Unfortunately, OPRA's considerable powers, which extend to ensur-ing that scheme administration is correctly carried out, only came into effect six days ago. As a result, it cannot help the 80,000 hapless members of the scores of small company schemes, controlled by Century Life, the insurer. Their numbers include the staff at Citizen's Advice Bureaux ling others on their financial problems. All are victims not of theft, but of the sundry ills that have dogged both company and personal pensions in the past decade including overea-

Their troubles began five years ago when their schemes were transferred from Crown Financial Management which had made a speciality of selling pension funds to small businesses through its salesmen and financial advisers. At the time, Century saw taking over the administration of such schemes as a marvellous money-making opportunity.

The principal problem for the scheme members has been the difficulty in obtaining information about their pensions, the kind of information that OPRA will ensure is provided regularly to all employees. Some members are close to retirement and income in old age. In its defence, Century has argued that the paper-work for many of the Crown schemes was woefully inadequate. The fat commissions paid by Crown to its middlemen out of contributions mean that a few schemes cannot meet their liabilities. Some firms have gone out of business and some trustees could not be located.

budsman's Office, which A handles disputes between schemes and individuals, has bear on Century to sort out the mess. Some progress has been made but the delay is now intolerable. The Department of Trade and Industry, which has responsibility for insur-ance companies, should interest itself actively in this affair, making it impossible for Century to substitute apologies for action any longer.

Jenny Grove reports on hardship under the 'third rate' rule

Cruel trap for war widows

Armed Forces and their families. It marks a change in the Armed Forces Pension Scheme which allowed a serviceman's widow one half of her husband's military pension, up from one third.

There was only one snag. Widows of those who had completed their military service before March 1973 were excluded from the legislative largesse - their pensions remained at the old rate. The result was to draw a cruel dividing line between older widows, some of whom now arch 31, 1973 is a significant date for ones. Members of the Armed Forces still serving in March 1973 were given the opportunity to buy in a half-rate widows' pension. Those who had already retired had no such chance. Today about 52,000 elderly widows still receive "third:rate" pensions. A study of 14 comparable Allied schemes by the Officers' Pensions Society, headed by Major General Peter Bonnet, reveals that no other country pays such poor pento military widows. "Their husbands invariably fought through the Second World War. At the very least pension," he said.

Last year Nicholas Soumes as Minister for the Armed Forces, said that improving "third rate" widows' pensions by raising the rate from one third to one half would cost about £29 million a year,

One widow receiving only one third of her husband's pension is Mrs May Harbin. 84. Her husband, Lieutenant Henry Harbin, whom she married in 1936, was parachuted into Normandy on D-Day where he was wounded twice. He retired from the Army in 1965 and died 21 years later. Mrs Harbin said it was "utterly wrong" that widows in her position should be penalised because their husbands had left the forces before March 1973. "My husband spent 41 years in the Army. It's not much of a reward for long service, is it? It's quite hard to manage on my income. I just have to be frugal," she said.

Coronation Street recently highlighted another quirk in military pensions when it featured a war widow who fell in love. In the television series, Clare Palmer forfeited her war widows' pension when she decided to live with Des Barnes. Having opted for Clare lost both when the relationship foundered. A war Forces Family pensions if she remarries or lives with a man as husband and wife.

It may be some consolation for real-life Clare Palmers that should such relationships break down, their war widows' pension will now be restored automatically after a rule change this month. Even so, many war widows are unwilling to consider remarriage for fear of jeopardising their fi-nancial security. Pension rules. they claim, consign them to permanent widowbood.

K ate Bartholomew, 75, gets no military pension, because she married Major John Bartholomew in 1974, after he had left the Army. His wartime career included minelaying on the Norfolk coastline, bomb disposal work and a rescue attempt at Great Yarmouth across a mined beach, for which he was awarded the George Medal. His first wife died in 1973 and he retired from the Army that year. Since his death, 20 years on, Mrs Bartholomew has recrived no military pension.

Until April 6, 1978, the Armed Forces Pension Scheme did not pay pensions to widows who married after their husbands had retired. The rules were changed on that date to enable such widows to get a pension, but only if their husbands served in the Forces after April 1978.

gypt has re-entered the public consciousness after the Oscar-winning exploits of The English Patient. However, watching the film, where a passionate love affair between two people is kindled against the backdrop of Caire's famous bazaar. you'd have no idea that the country actually had the world's fifth-largest stock exchange at the start of the Second World War in 1939.

That Cairo hardly springs to mind when compiling a list of stock exchanges is largely down to President Nasser. who nationalised the largest companies in the 1960s. This is beginning to change, Last May the Government began a privatisation programme with 91 state companies going under the hammer this year.

Economic reforms are putting the country back on the investment map, joining the ranks of nearby Israel, Jordan and Morocco, as well as the diverse countries of Latin America, the Far East and eastern and central Europe, which all come under the banner of emerging markets.

These regions are now the undoubted powerhouses of the global economy, putting the more developed US and European markets in the shade. According to the Union Bank of Switzerland, the developing economies produce half of global GDP, a proportion which is forecast to grow to two thirds by the year 2020. Attracted by this "growth differential" it is not surprising to learn that investors have ploughed more than $230 billion into stocks and shares in emerging markets since the 1980s. Despite the strength of the long-term trends, investors have not had an easy time in emerging markets. The Mexican peso crisis in 1994, in particular, dealt a body blow to the rest of Latin America and temporarily dragged down the other emerging mar-kets with it. Overall returns have sagged since. As UBS points out, emerging markets have underperformed every other major asset class except

Japan since 1985, and that country has provided thoroughly miserable returns.

So how can investors succeed in emerging markets? By dispelling the notion altogether, UBS suggests. In its latest Guide to the Emerging Markets, it has analysed 50 economies stretching from Argentina to Croatia, from the they should concentrate on a Philippines to Ukraine, and found them to be weakly few countries rather than spreading themselves across the whole lot. This is a "topcorrelated - that is, their behaviour has little to do with down approach.

For instance, enlivening your portfolio of developed country shares with a 10 per cent holding in all emerging markets actually diminishes risk, UBS shows. But dividing that 10 per cent between the four largest emerging economies of Brazil, Malaysia, Mexico and South Africa gives the

Malaysia and South Africa,

kets, have outgrown their lot in the emerging category.

This goes against the grain of the usual "bottom up" approach to emerging markets, which is to focus on particular stocks. UBS says that fund managers who pick markets will beat rivals who worst markets, although there is not always much in it.

Last year Venezuela topped all emerging markets with 132 per cent growth, although its 10 worst stocks managed only 33 per cent. In contrast, Korea, last year's emerging dog which fell back 39 per cent. had ten stocks that grew a creditable 30 per cent.

Richard Tunberlake, investment director of Portfolio Fund Managers, which runs a unit trust investing in emerging market funds, prefers to steer a middle course between "top down" and "bottom up"

r Timbertake said:
The problem with picking countries is that it is a lot more difficult than picking companies. Timing is crucial for selecting countries - there are exchange rates, macroeconomic factors and confidence to take into account. It is far easier to be scientific when analysing companies. When you do see a fundamental negative shift in countries you don't know when it will be reflected in the stock market."

He argues that the lack of correlation between emerging markets can help investors when one country is down another may be up. Besides, he says, country selection has only had a marked effect in the past 18 months, when "it was essential to be in Hong Kong but out of Thailand and South Korea, which were absolute dogs".

Focusing closely could overlook growth opportunities. Far better to be diversified in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Mexico. Hong Kong-China, South Korea, Taiwan, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Czech Republic and Poland.

The UK's biggest fund managers are not switching around their UK holdings because of the 150-point fall in the FT-SE 100 index of leading shares over the last month. The fall in share prices, following on from the decline in shares in the US, is not driving fund managers in to more defensive stocks or cash. Neither are they making significant portfolio changes because of the almost certain arrival of a Labour government. The biggest effect of the drop in the index has been on those who left purchasing their personal equity plans (Peps) until the last moment at the end of the tax year on April 5. The managers report that Pep sales were subdued until

Despite the likely arrival of the first Labour government for 18 years, the UK's big fund managers this week said they are not planning to change around their UK holdings entirely. None are about to move in to cash and many have been heartened by this week's pronouncements from the Labour Party

Over the last month the value of an about privatisation. To the surprise of average UK unit trust has fallen around many. Labour is no longer opposed, in being overweight in general industrial many. Labour is no longer opposed, in theory, to privatisations and believes that some industries would fare better in private hands.

Bridget Cleverly, Schroder director, said: "As far as the general election is concerned, we are not intending to make many changes to the portfolios of our trusts. A Labour win has already been priced in to the stock market. We are underweight in utilities companies. As far as currency is concerned, sterling being overweight in general industrial companies and have reduced our emphasis on exporters. We prefer leisure and food companies.

Stephen Whittaker, Perpetual's head of UK investment, said: "The Labour win has already been priced in to the market. Matthew Wall on a topsy-turvy week aybe it is the influence of the Hale-Bopp comet but this elec-LV L tion campaign has an Alice in Wonderland feel about it. Everything is topsy-turvy.

We are presented with the extraordinary situation of a Chancellor and his opposite number appearing to be more pro-European than the Foreign Secretary and his opposite number, and where a former BBC war correspondent is standing as an unlikely anti-sleaze candidate against an MP mired in the "cash-forquestions" scandal.

Meanwhile, the Institute of Fiscal Studies tells us, with a Carrollian flair for paradox, that although the overall burden of taxation has gone up since the last election, the average family is actually better off thanks to rising incomes.

The Tories tells us Britain is booming last week's record consumer credit figures seem to bear this out — and yet this week's manufacturing output figures showing a mere 0.2 per cent growth in February, seem to tell a different story.

This week's opinion polis are no less confusing. A MORI poll for The Times has Labour's lead over the Tories cut to 15 percentage points, whereas a Gallup poll for The Daily Telegraph has Labour 23 percentage points ahead. The voters, it seems, are just as volatile as the markets, which continue to behave erratically.

The FT-SE 100 index edged slightly higher this week, closing at 4,313.2 on Thursday, It fell to 4,270.7 on Friday, down 425, under the influence of New York. The Dow had recovered to finish on Thursday at 6,540.05. Its decline on Friday was attributed to news of robust retail sales which had awakenened fears of higher interest rates.

Comparative figures from Datastream/ICV show that in this election the market is behaving broadly as it did during the 1992 campaign, with share prices falling and trading volumes depressed in the run-up to polling day. But there the similarity ends.

n 1992 the City feared a Labour victory that was being predicted by the polls. So when the Tories won the FT-SE soared instantly by over 150 points. This time, the City is resigned to a Labour victory in the knowledge that Tony Blair's party is a far cry from Neil Kinnock's. The market volatility in this campaign has more to do with Wall

This week saw the Labour Party supposedly more pro-Europe than the Tories, appearing — should it win power to rule out joining a European single currency in the lifetime of the next Parliament. The City had welcomed Labour's apparently pro-European stance since it sees the European convergence criteria of low inflation and low interest rates as prerequisites for strong domestic economic growth. Labour, it is believed, would be good for the UK bond markets. But this week's more sceptical noises have muddled the waters. Gilt-edged prices have fallen by nearly 10 per cent since February 18, with yields on ten-year gilts rising from a low of 7.09 per cent to 7.63 per cent now.

Although this seems to indicate renewed City fears of rising inflation under a Labour government, Mark Capleton, international bond strategist at BZW, the merchant bank, said: "The downward move in gilt prices is largely due to the US Treasury market, where yields on tenyear Treasuries have risen from 6.28 per cent to 6.91 per cent."

He added: " We have had a series of robust US economic data since February and this tipped the balance towards interest rate rises by the US Federal Reserve. Its 0.25 per cent rate increase is certain to be followed by others and this is making the bond and equity markets

As inflation is the bond market's mortal enemy, you would have thought that increasing interest rates to tackle inflation would be welcomed. But as short-term interest rates rise, so does the cost of borrowing for companies and their customers. Profits are put under pressure and this affects the sentiment on

DON'T JUST BAVE, SAVE A'ND PROSPER,

Indecided: Margaret and David Crerar, who have been seeking clarification on the Bristol & West shares offer s members of the Bristol & West prepare for Tuesday's vote on the society's planned acquisition by the Bank of Ireland, some may find themselves perplexed by what they are being offered - like David and Margaret Crerar.

Under the terms of the deal, eligible two-year investing Bristol & West members who had £100 in their accounts on the requisite dates will receive a cash bonus of more than El,100. Savers who did not meet the £100 requirement but who topped up their accounts in time, will get £250 in cash. who do not qualify for a cash bonus, will get at least 250 in preference shares. The preference shares are expected to be carry a dividend.

If the takeover goes ahead, Bristol & West will become Bristol & West plc, which will be wholly-owned by the Bank of Ireland and listed on the London Stock Exchange. This has led to Mr Crerar's question: "If the new company is to be a wholly-owned subsidiary how can they issue shares in the new company to current shareholders? Surely, Bristol & West ceases to be whollyowned in that case."

Mr Crerar has written twice to the society without receiving satisfactory response. The

and has more to do with the nature of preference shares than the structure of the deal. Preference shares fall somewhere between ordinary shares and corporate bonds or debt. Ordinary shares are a share in the ownership of the company. Anyone who has more than 50 per cent of the outstanding ordinary shares in a company becomes a majority shareholder with controlling rights. Preference shares confer no such ownership rights but pay a guaranteed dividend which is not linked to profitability and, in the event of a company failure, preference shareholders are paid out first.

Members who have not

Bad news for bonus-hunting small investors

n a week when the Bristol & West and Northern Rock are both holding special meetings — the former to vote on merger, the latter to vote on plans to convert to a listed company -- bonus-hunters may be looking for a new home for their money in the hope of receiving another building society windfall (Karen Zagor writes).

Alastair McArthur, an 18rear-old student, currently has £1,500 in a National Savings Investment account and wants to know which societies may float in the next year or so.

The bad news for Mr

McArthur and other windfall hunters is that the stampede to merge or convert has probably ended. Furthermore, in an attempt to deter bounty-hunters. many societies have raised the lower limits for accounts that confer membership status. And societies are not necessarily offering the best rates on the market. A National Savings Investment account will currently pay 5.25 per cent gross on amounts between £500 and £25,000. According to research by Money-Facts, Mr McArthur would have to go to Sainsbury's Bank, which is paying 5.75 over El, to beat that rate. For Mr McArthur, and other non-taxpayers, one advantage of remaining with National Savings is that the interest is paid gross. With bank and building society savings accounts, 20 per cent tax is taken at source unless the saver fills out a form to receive the income gross,

If Mr McArthur wants to gamble and accept a lower rate in the short term in the hopes of long-term profit-ability, he could shop around for the best deals from one of the remaining societies. Although their rates may not match Sainsbury's, which is new to the savings scene and trying to build a customer base, there are some reasonable

Building society rates started to improve last year, when the societies realised the needed to give members evidence of the benefits of mutuality. Bradford & Bingley, for example, now offers savings rates on average. 0.5 percentage points higher than its competitors. On £1,500, a B&B instantaccess account will pay 3.1 per cent. a one-year bond 5.35 per cent. an instantaccess postal account 4.8 per cent and a 30-day notice postal account 5.1 per cent.

ome buyers whose new property has a history of subsidence from the past two years of dry summers, are being left high and dry by insurers who have previously covered the propercontinue once the new owner takes possession. Sales are collapsing because buyers cannot find cover elsewhere.

Such refusals fly in the face of an insurance industry convention that the existing insurer continues to offer cover on properties which have been underpinned or have other problems. This is meant to protect homeowners who would otherwise face rejection from other insurers and be unable to buy because lenders insist on buildings insurance.

Robert Hooker, of the Subsidence Claims Advisory Bureau. which advises on subsidence claims, said the bureau was being approached by morebuyers as the property market continues to pick up. He said: "We have a lot of desperate callers who want to exchange but cannot get insurance. Companies will meet nothing to compel its mem-claims and pay for repairs but won't accept new business when there is a new owner." Mr Hooker, added many insurers are guilty of refusing to continue cover. "It is a form of

The problem is particularly acute in London and the South East, which is among the most subsidence-prone areas in the country and which is also experiencing the most buoyant property markets.

The Association of British Insurers (ABI) said there was

Sara McConnell on a case of maladministration

The pension that shrank

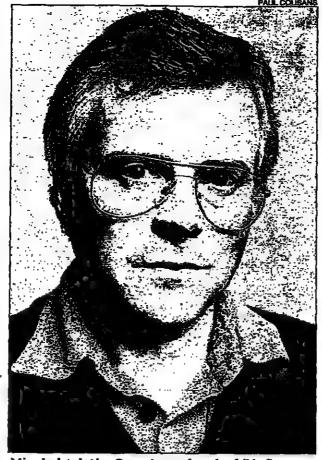

s it safe to assume that you have been given the right information from your company when you are trying to review your pension arrangements? Not necessarily. But if you have been told the wrong thing and believe you have lost out as a consequence, do you have any comeback? Unfortunately, probably not.

Alan Bowen, a Weekend Money reader, is an accountant by profession and likes to review his pension position regularly, generally when he moves jobs. He relies on information from employers to decide whether to leave his pension invested or transfer it. Wrongly, as he discovered.

"I worked for a company from April 1985 until September 1987. On leaving I received a letter from the company telling me that I had certain options regarding my com-pany pension. [The options were to leave the pension where it was, transfer it to a new employer's scheme, or transfer it to a personal pension). I decided that in the circumstances it was beneficial to leave it with the company and my new employer contributed to an executive personal pension scheme on my behalf.

"In 1991 I changed jobs again and asked for a transfer value for my frozen pension with the first company. They sent me a transfer form showing a transfer value of £6,574 or an annual pension of £5,499. In 1996, I asked for another transfer value because I changed jobs again and they gave me a transfer value of £4.891, or an annual pension

"I pointed out that over time the figures should increase, not decrease. They replied by telling me the 1991 figures were a mistake. I had requested the transfer values because I felt it was appropriate to review my pension. The 1991 information led me to believe that the current position was fine, that the funds were best left with the company and I did not need to make additionvoluntary contributions (AVCs) to top up my pension and cover any shortfall. But now I feel I should have been paying AVCs from early 1991.

The company has apologised and seems to think this is sufficient. But it cannot be right that large employers can promise people one thing and then withdraw it. The company's information caused me to take an inappropriate course of action and I can never recover six lost years of AVCs."

you that it made an adminis trative error when you first asked for a transfer value in 1989. The wrong (higher) figure was written on the transfer form and keyed into the computer, overriding and recalculating the original benefits. Staff who calculated your value at the time had wrongly indexed it by 5 per cent a year when there should not have been any increase at all. This threw out calculations in 1991 and the mistake was not discovered until you queried it last year. The company says it would have caught the mis-take in 1991 if you had actually wanted to take the transfer

The problem is that legally you have few grounds for redress. According to Penny Green, chief executive of the Occupational Pensions Advisory Service (Opas), the charity which gives free advice on occupational pensions, you have not suffered an actual loss, only a disappointment. As your pension from the company will be based on your final salary with the company, you will still get the value of your pension.

Election adds new dimension to annuity see-saw quandary

The launch of the Government's privatisation plans last month means that pensions of the future have become a political battleground in the run-up to the general election. But the possiblity of a change in annuity rates means that May pensions in the shorter term. The City is predicting that interest rates could rise by as much as 0.5 per cent after polling day, and that this could mean an improvement in annuity deals. This possibility is troubling Walter Toubkin, a reader of Week-

Mr Toubkin holds a per-sonal pension plan which has already matured, and Inland Revenue regulations mean that he has until June to buy his annuity. "I've been told I might get a better deal after the election," he said. "Is it worth rue holding on?"

Pension fund holders buying annuities in the next few classic problem of the annuity see-saw. Before the election interest rates are likely to remain low, and the stock market should be relatively buoyant, so your pension fund ought to be healthy and you will have plenty of annuity buying power. But low interest rates also mean that many annuity deals are now poor.

After polling day, a rise in interest rates is likely whichever party wins. This could mean an improvement in amounty rates, but it could also result in a stock market fall and a decrease in the value of your pension fund, which would reduce the size of annuity you could buy. Any gains made through obtaining a better annuity rate may be offset by this loss in buying potential. The possible election seesaw in which annuity rates and the value of pension funds balance out each other may seem to offer a no-win situation. But, as William Sallitt of the Annuity Bureau, the independent annuity specialist, explained, there is one way you could make the most of polling day changes. "If interest rates are likely to rise and you are buying an annuity in the near future, it could make sense to withdraw your pension money and place it in a secure cash fund for a few months," he said. All those with unit-linked policies are able to do this, and using this method you can make sure you lose no buying power if the market falls," he added. "If annuity rates then rise you are able to take full advantage — it is a way of exploiting both sides of the annuity see-saw."

But be warned that annuity market fluctuations are notoriously difficult to predict, and rates could affect the value of your pension fund. However, if there is a post-election rise and all else goes according to plan, securing your capital in a cash fund and waiting until after May I before buying could reap you more than 5 per cent a year extra income. according to some insurers.

Annuity rates vary widely and the wrong choice could cut your annual income by thousands of pounds for the rest of your life. The insurance company that has been running your pension does not necessarily offer the best annuity and you have the right to take your fund to another insurer offering better rates. Currently returns from the companies listed by Annuity Bureau on an annuity of E75,000 range from £6,550 per year from Scottish Amicable to £8,049 at Stalwart Assurance, and choosing the more competitive option would make a difference of £14,990 after ten years.

"Selecting where to buy your amouty and timing your pur-chase can make a large difference to your income levels." Mr Salhitt said. "Many people make careful decisions when it comes to choosing a pension plan, but the importance of annuity choices is less well known, and it is time that the public became more aware."

Pension recipe lands chef in the soup

Schemes designed to sidestep UK rules on buying annuities with the proceeds of pension funds are being offered to notential customers by a Sussex company. Knightsbridge International Tax Consultants claims customers can receive 90 per cent of their pension fund tax free, after setting up loan arrangements abroad.

Its claims have emerged days after the High Court endorsed a Revenue decision to impose heavy penalties on star chef Michel Roux, of the Waterside Inn, who had attempted to avoid having to use his fund to buy an annuity. Under UK pension rules, 75 per cent of a pension fund must be used to buy an annuity, which pays a taxable income for life. Only 25 per cent can be taken tax free. This causes resentment among those who feel annuity rates scheme into a new fund offshore. The scheme was unapproved, which meant it did not qualify for tax breaks and would not be bound by Revenue rules on annuities. But the Revenue decided the transfer amounted to tax avoidance and removed approval from the old scheme. leaving M Roux with an estimated £400,000 tax bill.

But companies like Knightsbridge International say they intend to continue marketing annuity avoidance schemes until there is a change in the law.

Knightsbridge is a marketing agent for four advisers offering schemes. One involves setting up a new plan with the proceeds of an existing one, using it to buy a deferred annuity in Europe then taking a tax free loan for 90 per cent of the fund on the security of the annuity. Income from the fund can also be drawn tax free, it claims.

TAX SELF-ASSESSMENT SPECIAL REPORT

says the new

self-assessment

form is different but not difficult to understand

The first self-assessment (SA) tax forms were dispatched this week to the eight million individuals affected by the new system. SA, the largest single reform of income tax since its introduction in 1798, will bring big changes for the self-employed and higher-rate expayers. If you have already received your form and are suffering a severe shock at its complexities and at the severe penalties you will face for inaccuracies or delays, read our guide to surviving SA.

SA requires that you carry out certain tasks by fixed deadlines. If you fail to deal with your tax affairs in a business-like way, you will be charged interest and surcharges and possibly worse. The second thing to note is that the new-style tax return may be unfamiliar but is not as difficult as it may seem. A trial carried out in Leicester over the past two years showed that 50 per cent of returns contained clerical errors which needed correction, such as arithmetical mistakes, figures entered in the wrong column,

The standard eight-page return may need to be supplemented by additional schedules so this is probably your extra schedules needed. SA makes no difference to independent taxation, where a husband and wife's tax affairs are treated separately. This means newlyweds Liam and Patsy will have to get to grips with its complexities in the same way as any other married couple.

You should note that the Inland Revenue has powers enabling them to check up. Tax officials will be using these powers and will not find it amusing if you are audited and found wanting.

Get organised. Start to collect the information that you will need (see summary). ■ Do not throw anything away. You should keep your records until January 31, 1999-January 31, 2003, if you run a business or receive rental income. The Revenue policy on SA is "Process now, check later". The Revenue will be able to open an inquiry into your 1996-97 return by serving notice before February I. 1999, and will not have to justify doing so.

Do not leave everything to an automatic £100 penalty for filing your return late and, while January 31, 1998, is a long way off, it will be easier to tackle the return whilst things are fresh in your mind. If there are any gaps in your records you have been under a legal obligation to keep adequate records since April 6, 1996 you may be able to reconstruct them by getting down to the task before the trail goes completely cold.

Do not send in an incomplete return; it will only be rejected. If you had benefits in a monte the product of the post of the pos

Start to put cash aside now so that you can settle your 1996-97 tax and make a pay-ment on account for 1997-98 next January 31. If you are short of funds after Christmas you may find yourself exposed to interest. The APR is currently 8.5 per cent. Worse still, if you are not able to clear your 1996-97 tax by February 28, you will be liable for an automatic 5 per cent surcharge equal to an APR of 60 per cent. Consider filing by September 30. Somerset House has given repeated assurances that filing early will not in-crease the likelihood of your return being selected for inquiry. On a positive note, the Revenue will collect underpayments of up to £1,000 via the PAYE system if you submit your return by September.

Work on the basis that your return will be selected for inquiry. The Revenue will be selecting 10,000 returns each year on a random basis. Tax offices are also expected to check another 30,000 returns. Remember to tick the box if your return contains any estimated or provisional figures. It will probably be in your own best interests to give an explanation of how you have arrived at the figures as this may preempt Revenue queries. It may also afford a degree of protection against the Revenue coming back after January 31, 1999, and reopening 1996-97 by mak-

You may already have enough life assurance cover to pay off the mortgage should anything happen to you. But how would your partner cope with all the other costs of living?

According to the Family Expenditure Survey 1994/5 (the latest available published figures), the average family spends £917 a month on things such as groceries, bills, clothing and leisure activities.

We know that no amount of money could ever replace your love for your dependants. However, from as little as 55p* a day you can cover their future with General

Term Assurance provides affordable life assurance protection for a fixed period, with a guaranteed cash sum payable on death during that period.

For a payment of only £17.00 a month* a General Accident Term Assurance policy can provide cover of £200,000 for 10 years, and what's more, your personal monthly premium is guaranteed never to increase.

An investment of £200,000 in a bank or building society would mean that your family could be sure of an income of £13,200 a year or £1,000 per month, And that income is over and above the initial £200,000 investment which would remain intact.

Call General Accident now to secure your family's future, and receive further information on Term Assurance and a personal illustration.

We'll also send you a FREE GIFT of a stylish Pen and Pencil set plus details of how to claim a second free gift - a choice of a Black and Decker Cordless Screwdriver, a Custom Monaco Roll Bag or a Casio Travel Clock

> Based on a healthy male, non-smoker, aged 30 next birthday. The cost of cover will depend on age, sex and smoking status.

EKONTI MAZZIONA Jo you need a nal pension that you retire early hout penalty?

Be assured for the term of your life

f you are in the market for a life insurance policy, now is a good time to opt for term assurance, according to a report this week by Swiss Re, the leading reinsurer.

Increasing competition and fading anxieties over Aids have resulted in an average 12 per cent drop in term assurance premiums since 1994. Customers are now benefiting from some of the lowest premium prices since the war.

Term assurance is the simplest and often cheapest form of cover that the life insurance industry can offer. It has no investment element. The policy is arranged for a fixed period to pay out a fixed sum. If you die, it pays. If you live,

The relatively low cost of term cover makes it the ideal choice for families who want a generous amount of life insurance for a small outlay. Recent publicity over the cost of the services carried out every week by a wife and mother has made families realise that both partners need life insurance. Although new men are reputed to be doing more around the house, to replace mother in her role as cook, cleaner, driver, nurse, gardener and such like will cost more than E300 a week.

However, a survey for The Times by London & Country. based in Bath, shows that Nathan Yates says increasing competition means the price of premiums has rarely been cheaper when buying term assurance it still pays to shop around. Premiums in this sector of the insurance market vary widely. A 35-year-old man could pay up to £32.30 a month for a 20year term with a payout of £100,000 with Clerical Medical. This compares well with the typical £50 cost of a wholelife policy of the same value, but is far from being the cheapest available.

If this customer were to buy a policy from Royal & Sun Alliance instead, he would cut the cost to just £10 a month. Over the full 20 years of the policy, this would make a difference of £5,352, which would mean that his bill would be cut by more than two thirds.

For a woman of 50 wanting the same cover, the savings could be even greater. Her monthly term insurance premium of £77.50 a month with Clerical Medical is again better than the £100 she would pay for a typical whole life policy, but selecting Royal & Sun Alliance would cut the bill to £21.10. Over 20 years this would add up to a saving of

are far from uncommon for term insurance customers, according to Patrick Bunton, of London & Country. "The term insurance market is now ficrcely competitive and we've seen premium reductions of up to 30 per cent since 1992." he said. Despite this, the gulf between the cheapest and most expensive insurers is huge. It is usually possible to cut the higher priced premiums by half through looking

Term assurance is similar to car insurance in that no one company is cheaper for all find the best deal is to obtain quotes. Time can be saved by using telebrokers to sift through several companies for

When hunting for a policy, there are other features to look for besides headline cost. Some insurers guarantee their premiums so that you can be sure of no rise in price. With others, there is nothing to stop the company from raising the rates after you buy the policy, though if this happens you are free to close the agreement and move elsewhere.

tional benefits with their deals. Customers may be allowed to claim immediately if they are diagnosed as terminally ill. allowing them the benefit of extra money while they are still alive. Some policies also offer an extra price reduction if you can prove that your job is low risk or if you take a medical test.

Perpetual's Offshore Income Accumulator Fund offers you a valuable combination of investment benefits: improved security, tax efficiency and flexibility.

Improved security, because the fund invests in bond and money markets which historically are a more predictable and less volatile investment than equities.

Tax efficient, because all income is reinvested in the fund allowing you to benefit from compound returns. And you can defer payment of tax on income earned until it is most beneficial to you. For example, when you are paying a lower rate of tax.

Flexible, because you can switch easily and economically between classes in the fund as and when you wish.

Profitable Peps — but for whom?

From Mr D.G. Pearson Sir, I have always believed that a quick calculation shows there is no real benefit in personal equity plans for most of us. (typical dividend 5 per cent, tax on this I per cent, typical management charge, 1 per cent). Only those for whom capital gains tax is an issue really benefit.

However, I have only recently realised how very expensive Peps can actually be. My wife holds shares in the BP General Pep, run by Midland Stockbrokers sponsored by BP. Last year, BP provided the option of taking dividends

Keeping up standards

From Mrs N.Bagshaw
Sir. In reply to Mr Purnell's question "is it always this difficult to get money out of the Scots?", (Scots take their revenge, March 22) — no it is not. My husband had an endowment policy with Standard Life, due to mature on February 15, 1995. The cheque was posted from the Edinburgh office on February 9, in good time to be in our bank account before the maturity date.

Having read various horror stories in the newspapers about delays in maturity payments, we were expecting similar service. We were pleasantly surprised both by the promptness of the issue of the cheque and by the fact that we were kept informed of the procedures involved in the repayment of the mortgage and the progress made, from two months before maturity date. Yours faithfully, NORMA BAGSHAW,

in new shares rather than in cash. This option is just as available to ordinary shareholders as it is to Pep managers. However, Midland tell me that tax cannot be reclaimed on such scrip issues. The only tax they can reclaim is on the small difference between the full dividend and the value of the whole number of shares allocated - something less Midland clearly thought that they deserved a greater reward for this, so last year they increased the annual charge from a flat £10 to 0.3 than most Peps). Of course, in order to collect their £50 they have to reduce the number of scrip shares and take part of the dividend in cash.

In short, the only service they provide for the managefee is to raise enough cash to collect their fee. Last November's statement read: Scrip dividend 17 shares, Cash dividend 19.65. Management Fees £12.73, Tax Credit reclaimed £2.41. Yours faithfully,

D. PEARSON, Moravka, Beech Grove,

been £193,025. A slight difference of £192,459 but who is counting? Certainly not Lloyds Bank Yours faithfully. ROBERT BRECKMAN, Breckman & Company, Chartered Accountants, 49 South Molton Street, W1.

The rack for pension providers

From Mr F. Beecheno Sir, Referring to John Trayner's very measured letter (A simple way to reduce pension costs, March 22), the time has surely come that personal pensions providers should be coerced further into providing meaningful figures to enable their customers to judge not only their effective charging but also their performance.

The annual pensions statements I have seen are marvels of deceit by omission: no indication of deductions, no comparison of performance. It need not be this way, but I see no sign of pensions companies striving to rectify this second scandal. I recommend an annual face-to-face with pensions representatives to put to them pointed questions over their outrageous charges and pedestrian performance. Yours faithfully, FRANCIS BEECHENO. 46 South Park Road,

Voting with our feet

From Ms A.Freer Sir. I write to support the excellent letter from the Bishop of Beverley (Halifax board has moral duty to disabled. March 29) about the lack of moral responsibility on the part of members of the Board of the Halifax Building Society in denying shares to disabled customers young and old.

I am a friend's receiver and hold her account and my own at the Woolwich, which has the same policy as the Halifax - denial of shares to those whose right it is to have them. There must be hundreds of us who will be moving accounts after the conversion unless their policy is changed by law. ANNA FREER 39 Hexham Road, SE27.

Societies' scourge plans fourth Bill

ouglas French, the Tory candi- holders at their building societies. date for Gloucester, champion of the rights of building society savers, plans a fourth Private Member's Bill to force converting societies to give free shares to all their customers when they float on the Stock Exchange. This would finally end the injustice done to. thousands of of savers who have been excluded from building society payouts because they are the second-named holders on accounts. Under current rules, only first-named accountholders benefit.

As an MP, Mr French has demonstrated remarkable skill and luck in piloting two Private Member's Bills through Parllament under its Ten-Minute Rule in the past two years. Both sought to extend the scope of payouts from mutual building societies when they float or merge with listed companies. The latest, which enshrined the rights of disabled savers. received Royal Assent just as Parliament was prorogued for the general election. The Times led the campaign for the rights of thousands of disabled savers. unable to manage their own financial affairs who were second-named account

In piloting three Bills through the House, Mr French has equalled a record only previously achieved by Roy Jenkins, now Lord Jenkins of Hillhead, and Sir Gerald Nabarro in the 1960s. "I need a third one to see off the opposition," said Mr French, if re-elected, he intends to introduce a one-line amendment making his first Act compulsory rather than voluntary. Under the Building Societies (Joint Account Holders) Act 1995, societies can include in their share windfalls savers such as widowers, newlyweds and divorcees who are the named second on joint accounts. Mr French said all the societies that have embarked on demutualisation since the passing of the Joint Holders Act - Alliance & Leicester. Halifax, Northern Rock and Woolwichhad only applied the Act for widowers, on the grounds that it is administratively too complex. "Just a cop out." he said. The Alliance & Leicester has, however, made concessions to its disabled savers and the Northern Rock will pay £1 million into charities for the disabled by way of compensation for the lost payouts.

Mr French, who defends a majority of 6.000, is confident the amendment would be approved as it would not make the Act retrospective and is manifestly just. "The building societies have excluded millions of members from sharing in conversions. They should not get away with it."

An Equitable way to top up your company pension.

Did you know that to receive the maximum pension wailable, you would typically have to be a member of the same company pension scheme for 40 years?

Or that changing your job, even once, could dramatically reduce your pension? So that, just when you have more time to enjoy life, you have less money.

Topping up your company pension with an Equitable Free-Standing Additional Voluntary Contribution Scheme can help bridge the gap. You make contributions from your gross income, with tax relief at the highest rate you pay. Remember that the value of tax relief available will depend on individual circumstances, and that current legislation can change in the future. What's more, we don't believe in paying commission to third parties for the introduction of new business.

RACING: WORKWATCHERS ON DAWN PATROL AS CECIL-TRAINED FILLY FACES CRUCIAL GALLOP

Early risers in search of Sleepytime

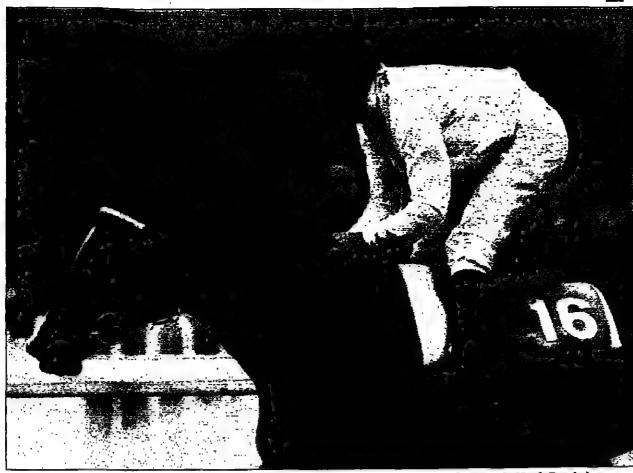

WORKWATCHERS at Newmarket will be out in force this weekend when Sleepytime, whose midweek absence from the gallops alarmed supporters of the 1,000 Guineas favourite, resumes fast work in preparation for the fillies' classic on May 4.

After three days on the easy list, Sleepytime must come through a strenuous workout to secure her place in the Fred Darling Stakes, her selected prep race at Newbury on Friday. Tote Cherry-Downes, racing manager to Sleepytime's owner, Greenbay Sta-bles, said yesterday the holdup had not compromised her prospects, and that the filly never succumbed to the lung infection afflicting a small minority of Henry Cecil's

"I expect she will work this weekend - possibly on Sun-day if Henry wants an extra day before galloping her," Cherry-Downes said, "She was trotting around Side Hill on Thursday and was out again on Friday so it is not as if she has been inactive.

"Sleepytime has always been totally clear of any problem and recent tests have reconfirmed that," he continued. "If you work horses when they're affected, then you can ruin them. It is good stable practice to test others if one horse shows up with mucus on the lungs. That is all Henry

Of Sefton Stakes at Newmarket on Wednesday — although Cherry-Downes said the fouryear-old goes best with cut in the ground.

Cecil's two runners at Nottingham yesterday failed to collect. Courtship ran disappointingly behind Sekarl in the Levy Board Stakes but Barrier Ridge fared better in the Bassingfield Maiden Stakes, chasing home the more experienced China Red. Doubtless there will be relief first winner of the present campaign.

No such tribulations surround Criquette Head's stable in Chantilly. Mme Head yesterday expressed herself "very satisfied" with her 1,000 Guineas candidate, Pas De

Reponse, who galloped to a bloodless victory in the threerunner Prix Imprudence over seven furlongs at Maisons-

The Danzig filly made all to win by 2's lengths from Barnata. prompting

Reponse's classic odds to 6-1. from a point longer. "She does everything so easily at home that I told Freddie [Head] to make sure she had a good bit of work today." Mme Head said. "She should be in perfect shape for the 1,000 Guineas. I couldn't be happier."

There was British success in the colts' equivalent, the Prix Diebel, when Clive Brittain's raider. Fantastic Fellow, made all to beat Nombre Premier comfortably by threequarters of a length. Tomba, from Brian Meehan's stable, was fourth.

Fantastic Fellow may return to France for the Poule d'Essai des Poulains, although the colt is also entered at Newmarket. Brittain said his charge had thrived over the winter but this victory paid tribute to Bahamian Bounty, who had Fantastic Fellow just over a length back in fourth place in the Middle Park Stakes. Now trained by Godolphin, Bahamian Bounty is expected to line up in the French classic on his return from Dubai.

Fantastic Fellow was yesterday among six late entrants to the Derby at Epsom in June. His prospects of staying 12 furlongs are minimal but he joins Desert King, Johan Cruyff, Latalomne, Panama City and Revoque, the champion juvenile of Europe, in the Derby melting pot. Owners of the sextet contributed an extra £64,000 in entry fees towards the event, which is expected to carry prize-money of £1 mil-

Crack On to make further progress

2.00: Serious should not be taken lightly, but his two wins over hurdles have come on the much sharper Uttoxeter circuit and he had stamina limitations on the Flat. Crack On, who jumped sketchily on his chasing debut, returns to hurdling still on a handy mark. Well suited by a stiff, right-handed track, he can overcome a 7lb higher mark than for his win at Sandown in November, when value for much more than a 21-length margin. Alltime Dancer has struggled in handicaps this term after a prolific season sor is at last relenting.

2.35: Storm Alert is in his element round here but his best form is at two miles. Stamina is also a worry for Super Tactics, who has won at 212 miles but shown better form at the minimum. There are no such fears over Amtrak Express and Bertone. who are set to battle this out. Amtrak Express, who was left in the Grand National until the five-day stage, is fresh. He gained his only success of last term over three miles at Sandown and ran well in the Whitbread there, so today's journey is probably shorter than ideal. Bertone is preferred after travelling supremely well for a long way over an extended three miles at Aintree. That bit younger and more progressive than his rivals, Kim Bailey's gelding returns to his best distance and looks fairly treated off the same handicap mark.

3.10: Trainglot, the winner of almost £200,000 in prizemoney, runs his last race today. The ten-year-old has often been campaigned in the highest class, and faces much easier opposition than when seventh to Karshi in the Stayers' Hurdle at Cheltenham last time out. He should sign off on a winning note, but the possibility he is not the force of old precludes maximum confidence. It would be an open race if the favourite fails to deliver.

ATHLETICS: FAST TIMES LIKELY TO EMERGE FROM RECORD LONDON MARATHON FIELD

Britons can enjoy vintage year

By David Powell, athletics correspondent

IF THERE Is a sniff of poacher-turned-gamekeeper in the air on Blackheath for the Flora London Marathon tomorrow, Linford Christie having accepted the role of official starter, it will be nothing to the smell of massage oil and linament. More preventative rub for aches and pains than ever will be needed as a record field of 28,000 prepares to set off. But, never mind the width, feel the quality. Weather and other uncontrollable influences permit-ting this could be the best London Marathon this decade. It may even compare with the two that stand out in the 16-year history of the event. Those were in 1985, when the British men scored a 1-2-3 and Ingrid Kristiansen set a women's world record.

Only in The Times next week: the complete list of Landon Marathon finishers and in 1989, when six men 2hr l0min and Veronique Marot won the women's race with a British record.

Marot's mark of 2hr 25min Sosec still stands, but Liz McColgan, who last year became the first British woman since Marot to win, will not attack the time, even though there is a bonus incentive for her to do so. McColgan recognises that the field is too strong for her to be sidetracked from her main task of winning. though, given the strength of the opposition, she may need the record to triumph. McColgan is fit for her defence but there is a real possibility that she could run faster than last year and not win. This is likely to be the first time that five women break 24 hours on the course. Manuela Machado, the European and world champion, and Anuta Catuna, the New York City Marathon champion, are among the challengers about winning," McColgan said, "With a field of this calibre, there is a chance to run fast anyway. I am running strong."

It seems a missed market ing opportunity that Mc-Colgan has had no offers of sponsorship from the insect repellent industry. She was similarly confident before the Olympic Games in Atlanta last summer, but fell ill after being bitten by an insect and finished sixteenth. The nearest thing she has suffered to an insect bite this week has been from The Mirror, which yesterday offered secrets from her

While McColgan, Machado and Catuna are the favourites, with Ren Xiujuan, from China, Lidia Simon, from Romania, and Joyce Chepchumba, from Kenya, only marginally less fancied, the best two longshot bets would be Esther Kiplagat, from Kenya, and Sonja Krolik, from Germany. If Marian Sutton, Britain's other leading contender, is to make an impression it will be in the same way as she won the Chicago Marathon last

Sutton indicated yesterday that she would not follow the pacemaker, who has been asked to reach halfway in 72min 30sec. She is aiming to break 2hr 30min for the first time and said: "I have to be sensible with a pace I know I can handle."

Antonio Pinto, Irom Portugal, will start as favourite for the men's race, with Paul Evans and Richard Nerurkar, from Britain, his strongest challengers. Josiah Thugwane, the Olympic champion from South Africa, is another contender, as is Steve Moneghetti, from Australia. Armando Quintanilla, from looks the best Mexico. outsider.

Evans has had no interruptions to his training since Chicago. "Winning Chicago finally made me realise that, over the marathon, on my day, I am as good as anyone in the world," Evans said. "This time I have planned how to win London. I have never done that before.

The pacemaker is going to go through the half in sub-64. which is what I want. I honestly think that this could be the greatest London ever and somebody is going to have "It is important to think only to run very fast to win it."

McColgan, below, and Sutton head the British challenge in the women's race tomorrow

Staying focused in adversity

IF YOU notice a runner towards the front of the Flora London Marathon far removed from the blue line that marks the shortest route, the chances are that it will be Noel Thatcher (David Powell writes). Although he cannot see more than five yards ahead, and then only shapes and colours. Thatcher is a contender to finish among the leading 100. He runs without a guide, keeping well away from others to avoid collisions.

and was appointed MBE this year after winning the 5,000 and 10,000 metres at the 1996 Atlanta Paralympics.

Despite difficulties at water stations, and regardless of the poor vision that precludes him from shielding from the wind among a group. Thatcher, a physiotherapist, has a best time of 2hr 35min 57sec and is confident of breaking 2min

If successful, that should put him among the fastest 100 of Thatcher, 31, from Harlow, the 28,000 expected starters is a category B2 blind runner and about on a par with Liz run closer to 27 miles than 26.

McColgan, but his prospects will be dimmer the brighter the day. "I am very photosensitive, so it is very painful to run in glare," he said. "in a marathon, you need to eradicate any source of minor stress." He would wear special sunglasses but lost them at Disneyland.

He loses time at the drinks stations — "I usually end up knocking over about six botties before I get one" - and by not following the blue line. Come the finish, he will have

Labour tipped to make marathon running

THE Flora London Marathon is a marginal constitu-ency. It really could go either way, for there are three would-be MPs taking part, there being nothing much else going on to distract them at this time of year. These are Alun Michael (Labour, Car-diff South and Penarth, personal best 4hr 9min), Gary Waller (Conservative, Keighley, 4hr 8min) and, the narrow favourite for this race within a race, John Austin-Walker (Labour, Woolwich, 3hr 56min). Waller, like his party, may not look like the swiftest right now, but can at least claim to have done it before. He has run in 12 London Marathons, including the first in 1981, complet-

The race will also include 74 clergy (including three women), 94 dentists (including seven women), 37 editors (including five women), 951 from the military (including 32 women) and 375 housewives fincluding 364 women). This column would have run, but unfortunately it has a subsequent engagement.

Score draw

Siddalis Academicals football team, of Bicester, were 3-0 up with 15 minutes to play against their sworn enemies. Nightingale Dream Team, of Langford. It was then that Brian Govorusa, the Siddalls manager, played his trump. Onto the pitch came Debbie. She was wearing high heels and - er - that's it.

Govorusa said: "I hired the strippagram to out them off." Nice idea, but alas it was Siddalls themselves, a team of builders, who were mesmerised by Debbie's charms. The Nightingale Dream Team pulled back three goals and the match finished a draw. John Kerrison, manager of the Nightingale Dream Team, said: "My boys had seen it all before and kept playing. All the builders stopped and kept looking."

Lots and lots

The statue of Fred Perry, which stands hard by the entrance to the press-room at Wimbledon, presumably to encourage in us all a sense of perspective, is no more than about 3ft in height, but it still dwarfs every Brit who has picked up a tennis racket since his time. Now his trophies and medals are to come up for auction at Chrisrie's on June 20 and are expected to fetch about £150,000, for a lifetime's work. Fact: last year, Richard Krajicek, the winner of the gentlemen's singles at Wim-bledon, received £392,500,

Splitting hairs

Important rule-change from the International Judo Federation: "The tying of long hair during a contest will be allowed twice and any further stoppage of time will be a penalty of shido" — a threepoint penalty.

Presumably this applies to both sexes. In fact, some (female) fighters have been known to favour a slack hairtie, constant adjustment of which gives them muchneeded breathers. But has the way been opened for the strategic unravelling of the pony-tail?

Press-ganged

Yes, I know you wish they could do it here. The Prime Minister of Egypt, Dr Kamal al-Ganzouri, apparently traumatised by Egypt's dismal showing in a World Cup qualifier, has told newspaper editors to banish the very names of the shamed football stars from their pages. Egypt lost 1-0 to war-ravaged Liberia, which is the team bankrolled, as reported in this space last week, by the great George Weah (who, of course, scored the goal).

After this, the Egyptian Prime Minister summoned the country's editors and requested the press blackout.

"As a former footballer myself. I can say that our footballers made no effort," he said. "There is a difference between being beaten after a real effort and making no effort at all. The newspapers published the story on the front pages while stories about political meetings and the Council of Ministers were put on inside pages. They get everything they want from the state without fulfilling the trust placed in them." He demanded a footballing boy-cott of 50 days. One newspaper, Al Ahrar, gave in to his demands; the rest continued to pour scorn on the hapless players.

Famous five

Congratulations to the five readers of the year, aka the winners of this column's Wisden competition, the annual attempt to plumb the murky mind of the editor, Matthew Engel, and to predict his five cricketers of the year. He hinted at the playing of a wild card and this column speculated wildly at Sanath Jayasuriya, of Sri

The winners were, in fact, Jayasuriya, (only one entrant followed my astonishingly brilliant and perceptive guess), Mushtaq Ahmed, Saeed Anwar, Phil Simmons and Sachin Tendulkar: fine cricketers and not an Englishman among them. A copy of the 1997 Wisden goes to M. J. Liszka, John Baker, Mike Jackson, David Williams and Jon Edgson as a reward for their percipience. But still no one has got all

POINT-TO-POINT BY CARL EVANS

PREDICTING the weather used to involve guesswork, but not any more. It will be dry at least until the cricket season starts and the first garden feres hang out the bunting. This is why the Jockey Club decided this week to allow meetings to be postponed if it seemed that few horses would be in action on the parched ground. Such a meeting, the Portman at Badbury Rings. comes into that category today but instead of calling off the fixture, reduced entry fees of £10 and £5 are being charged. Notices warning the public that runners will be scarce are to be placed at the entrance. Badbury Rings has no watering facilities, other courses have been working overtime to moisten the ground, using bowsers, irrigation systems, slurry tankers and, in readiness for Wednesday's Tiverton meeting, an umbilical water carrier, a mile of tubing attached to a sprayer and a real lifeline for the fixture.

The ground must be reasonable for the Yorkshire trainer, Tim Walford, to risk his horses, which includes promising Ask Antony in the fourmile Grimthorpe Gold Cup at the Middleton tomorrow. Walford says it is and, since he is clerk of the course and responsible for watering, he should know. With Boulevard Bay in PPORA race, three in the members' and Noreasonatall in the maiden race, Walford is set for a busy day.

Julian Pritchard, the title leader, can win on Bagalino at the Ludlow meeting today and has excellent prospects on Lets Twist Again at the Ledbury tomorrow, both courses having been watered.

THE TIMES GUIDE TO THE PREMIERSHIP THIS WEEKEND

ARSENAL

Arsenal will not walk over Leicester City as they did over a pathetic Chelsea, not least because Leicester can bring in players cup-tied for the Coca-Cola final. Even without Adams and Merson, Arsenal surely have enough big guns to sink Leicester and maintain a challenge for the championship that has suddenly, even if by default, come alive again. Arsenal have no one as inventive as Garry Parker in midfield and Emile Heskey could trouble their defence.

DERBY COUNTY

It has not taken long for the Baseball Ground regulars to take Paulo Wanchope to their hearts. Jim Smith, the manager, is a little more cautious, though. While the Costa Rica striker created Derby's goal against Southampton in midweek, he lost possession all too easily in the build-up to Southampton's equaliser. Indeed, for all the comparisons with Heskey, Asprilla and Duncan Ferguson, Wanchope, 20. has much to learn — about English life let alone its football.

ASTON VILLA

Villa rattle on towards a place in Europe, courtesy of six wins from their past nine matches. but spare a thought for Gary Charles, the right back. Charles has not played since breaking an ankle in the 1-1 draw against West Ham United a year ago and, after two operations, is only now taking his first tentative steps back to full health. "Gary is making progress," Brian Little, the Villa manager, said. "He's had his ups and downs along the way but it's at last beginning to look better."

Everton's search for the elusive victory that should ensure safety continues against Tottenham Hotspur today. "It's a massive game, we're expected to win it and rightly so," Dave Watson, the caretaker playermanager, said. At least he has Earl Barrett back, but the injury problems continue, with Short and Unsworth struggling and Parkinson possibly out for the rest of the season. At least Watson has one consolation if they do not win today. Liverpool are the next visitors to Goodison.

BLACKBURN ROVERS

Alex Ferguson has finally found an ally in his quest to extend the season. Tony Parkes offered sympathy yesterday when considering the plight of Blackburn Rovers' opponents this afternoon: "Alex is right in the sense that people are jealous of Manchester United." But Parkes believes the Premiership cannot go back on its schedule. "If you extend the programme, then it should be for all teams, not just one or two," he said. Rovers have a full squad to choose from.

LEEDS'UNITED

Leeds at least cannot complain that they are playing too much football. With the fixture away to Wimbledon postponed to next Wednesday because of the FA Cup, they have played only one match in three weeks. Instead "we've been working very hard on our passing and on keeping possession", George Graham reported, although he had the grace to add "but you wouldn't have thought so", after the 0-0 draw with Blackburn Rovers on Monday. CHELSEA

Chelsea seem to be in deep crisis: their chief consolation being that Wimbledon, too, have gone off the boil. After the defeat at Coventry City on Wednesday. Steve Clarke, the defender, excoriated his team-mates. Chelsea's best semi-final hope may lie in their inconsistency. You never know how good or bad they will be. In Zola, Petrescu, Di Matteo and Mark Hughes they have players who rise to the great occasion, and Dennis Wise will be back to buzz about in midfield.

LEICESTER CITY

Steve Walsh transformed the Coca-Cola Cup final last week when he moved into the attack. However, a toe injury sustained against Everton in midweek leaves him doubtful for the replay against Middlesbrough on Wednesday. His absence can be absorbed against Arsenal this afternoon by the inclusion of Matt Elliott, who is cuptied. Elliott has impressed since his club record £1.6 million transfer from Oxford United and is unlikely to suffer in comparisons with Keown today.

COVENTRY CITY

Hot on the heels of Barcelona's rumoured E20 million bid for Alan Shearer, Darren Huckerby, the England Under-21 and

H. Pysh

Coventry winger, was recently reported to be worth £34 million. Admittedly, the fee was based on projected transfer fees in 2006 but it still caused much amusement in the Highfield Road camp. "I've really enjoyed it since moving here." Huckerby, formerly of Newcastle United, said, but all this story has done is get me a lot of stick from the other lads."

LIVERPOOL

Roy Evans does not merely have the headache of David James to trouble him. His whole defence has been shaky of late and it is within the back three that he must make some tough decisions before the game tomorrow at Roker Park. Mattee and Harkness will probably be replaced by Kvarme and Babb. We have the option to make changes, but I have to be careful not to overreact," Evans said yesterday. One change he will have to make is for the suspended McAteer. Jones will fill in. DM

MANCHESTER UNITED

We went to Germany with 21 fit players and came back with. It players and came tack with 16." Alex Ferguson, the manager, said yesterday. Schmeichel, May, Giggs, Irwin and Soiskjaer miss the trip to Blackburn, with Schmeichel virtually ruled out of the visit to Anfield next week too. The Saturday after a European trip has often been unrewarding for United, so this time they trained, had massages and treated their injured players in Germany before returning. "We think that's the better way of doing it," Ferguson said.

long, hair-taming Alice band with extra care tomorrow. He is, after all, replacing the cup-tied Mark Schwarzer in goal for the FA Cup semi-final against Chesterfield at Old Trafford, Meanwhile Bryan Robson, the manager, has taken to telephoning per-ceived media detractors. Fed up with criticism of "my lads" he takes exception to suggestions the club has spent too much money and, so far, achieved too little success. Time will tell.

NEWCASTLE UNITED

Kenny Dalglish has refused to join in the argument over plans to extend this season. The Newcastle manager, however, has offered a sensible blueprint for next season. Dalglish wants to see all international matches played on a Saturday, Sky Television choosing its games before the fixture list is published, and then sticking to it, and all European dates being kept clear for the top clubs. He has also issued a firm warning to any clubs eyeing Alan Shearer:
"He is not for sale at any price."

DM NOTTINGHAM FOREST

Another difficult week in a difficult season for this troubled club. The players were enjoying a three-day break in mouth when Southampton moved above them in the table, sending Forest to the bottom. Meanwhile, Chris Bart-Williams was sent off for the reserves on his first appearance back after injury. Perhaps it is as well that they are without a game today. Dave Bassett, the general manager, is using the opportunity to make a scouting trip to France.

SOUTHAMPTON

A Southampton University computer suggests that 39 points will guarantee FA Caring Premiership safety this season, but that Southampton have only a 41 per cent chance of getting them, rising to more than 60 per cent if they beat West Ham United at The Dell today. Unfortunately, while a victory would lift them above the visitors, Southampton have not won at home since December 21, and are without Matthew Le Tissier, who left the field after only 16 minutes at the Baseball Ground. NS

TOTTENHAM HOTSPUR

Remember Ramon Vega, the Switzerland central defender who signed for Tottenham for £3.7 million from Cagliari, of Italy, three months ago? Not a lot of people do. Vega was booked in his first game, and replaced in the 69th minute; he was booked in his second game, and subsequently sent off; in his third game, he was substituted three minutes into the second half. He has since missed ten matches through injury and suspension but, allegedly, will return line-up. Hirst is struggling with a hamstring injury and Humphreys is in line to deputise. Pleat is also likely to recall Stefanovic, for Nicol. SUNDERLAND During his days at Anfield, Paul Stewart spent more time on the golf course than on the pitch but, a slight calf injury permitting, he will be in Sunderland's starting line-up tomorrow against Liverpool at Roker Park, a fixture vital to both Liverpool's championship challenge and Sunderland's attempt to avoid relegation. Peter Reid will be asking Richard Ord to mark Robbie Fowler as tightly as he did Alan Shearer in the drawn match away to Newcastle United last week.

West ham United

"I've no doubt he'll enjoy the challenge and bring success to the club." So did Harry Redknapp welcome Graeme Souness and his Southampton team to Upton Park in August. One relegation battle later, Redknapp goes to The Dell today seeking to inflict further misery on a rival manager that he has "got a lot of time for". Redknapp, who welcomes back Dicks from suspension, has said all winter that 42 points will be needed for survival. "I think we'll be all right," he said.

Roberts in goal as biggest week beckons

By PETER BALL

MIDDLESBROUGH have been bedevilled with injuries for most of the season. There is no change tomorrow, as they embark on the most momentous four days to the club's history without their captain, Nigel Pearson, and with their new £1.3 million goalkeeper. Mark Schwarzer, on crutches.

Schwarzer is ineligible for the FA Cup semi-final against Chesterfield tomorrow, but he is now also doubtful for the Coca-Cola Cup final replay on Wednesday. His replacement will be Ben Roberts, 21, who began the season as the club's third-choice goalkeeper, but had just claimed a first-team place when Schwarzer was

I hope to show I can do it on the big occasion," Roberts said yesterday. "You've got to be confident in yourself, otherwise you freeze. I'm really looking forward to Sunday. My mind has been on it for weeks — it's the biggest game of my career."

Bryan Robson also has confidence in his goalkeeper. "I've no worries about Ben," the Middlesbrough manager said. "His temperament is very good. He's so cool."

The loss of Pearson and Stamp, added to the absence of Cox, who is suspended, means that Robson is again facing changes for what he describes, with a relegation battle against Sunderland next weekend, as "the biggest week in the club's history".

He added: "I seem to be saying that every week, but I don't mind repeating it to the players. We can make club history by reaching the FA Cup Final for the first time. I want to win the FA Cup. because I want us to be in the Cup Winners' Cup next season rather than the Uein Qup it's easier to win."

He would be ill-advised to say that around Anfield, but Robson is delighted with the venue for the game tomorrow. "We will respect Chesterfield," he said, "but the great thing for us is that the game is at Old Trafford, where the pitch is good, and that will suit us."

Keeper shapes up on a diet of chips

A s legend has it. Neil Sullivan leapt high from his seat, punched the air and celebrated wildly when David Seaman, the England goalkeeper, saved the penalty from Gary McAllister. the Scotland captain, during the European championship last year. It was, after all, no more than a typical reaction from a true-blue Englishman, born and bred in Surrey and with three lions pounding on

In truth, Sullivan, the Wimbledon goalkeeper, watched relatively nonplussed in a beach-front bar in Barbados, where he was on holiday with his girlfriend, Julie, a Scot. "If I'd been jumping up and down as I was supposed to have been, she'd have given me a swift right hook, he said. Perhaps I did favour England, maybe I was egging them on inside, but I don't think I really showed it."

As he lounged in the shade, sipped a cool drink and tried to keep his emotions in check, the significance of the moment could not possibly have dis-turbed his idyllic break. In February, eight months later, it struck with a vengeance.

Sullivan, 27, who plays for Wimbledon against Chelsea in the FA Cup semi-final at Highbury tomorrow, was selected for the Scotland squad to meet Estonia in their restaged World Cup qualifying match in Monaco. He had discovered a Celtic connection (his maternal grandfather, Andy Campbell), pursued it with vigour and then persuaded Craig Brown, the Scotland manager, that he was good enough with a series of agile

Although the story of Seaman's save had become distorted, the natives north of the border were enraged. "I know the rules allow it but I have to disagree," Tommy Docherty, the former Scotland manager, blustered. "It is farcical."

By Russell Kempson

Several influential Scottish observers said it, too, their poison pens dripping with anti-Anglo vitriol. How could Brown pick a southern-softie Sassenach who had dared to revel in McAllister's misery? Sullivan chuckles, which he does frequently. He has a disarming nature, appears at ease in any company, Crazy Gang or otherwise, and recalls the controversy with little more than amusement. "It was only one or two people who got upset," he said. "It affected me a bit at first but once I had spoken to Craig about it, everything was line. The real Scottish supporters have been superb." Other cynics might claim that Sullivan is ideally quali-fied for the Scotland goalkeeping jersey after his much-highlighted errors, in successive matches, against Manchester United and Newcastle United at the start of this season. David the Manchester Beckham, United midfield player, outrageously lobbed the ball over him from inside the United half; David Batty, of Newcastle United, chipped in 'his ill-directed headed clearance from 35 yards. Again, he chuckles at the memories. 'With Beckham's shot, I knew it was going to be close as soon as he hit it. Then I thought: 'Hello, it's getting closer.' Then I thought: I'm not going to get it.' It must have dropped an inch under the crossbar ... but at least I'm going to be on television for the next 50

His team-mates still rib him about his place in history and, during training, often attempt to beat him from the halfway line. He has also had his training shoes nailed to the floor and Deep Heat surreptitiously smeared in his underpants. "I suppose it's all part of our tradition." he said. Though he denies taking a ringleader's role in such pranks - "I just watch it all go on," he said, albeit unconvincingly - he admits a deep-rooted affection for the Wimbledon way. He joined the club in his early teens, as a goalkeeper, yet still turned out for Oakway Ajax, in the local Morden youth league, as a midfield player. "At that age, you just want to play football,"

he said. "You don't care where you play." Decision day arrived when, at 14, the Junction Tavern pub side from nearby Raynes Park called on his talents. "It was good fun for a while but when you've got a six-foot bruiser full of beer bearing down on you, you know it's time to get serious. I had to give it up, the club wouldn't let me play for them any more." Sullivan accepts that he still has much to learn - he earned a regular first-team slot only last season, having twice re-

The match in Paris was the first of four games in nine days for Liverpool, a sequence that will decide their fate this season. Tor six years, Sean Dyche has wondered whether tomorrow would ever come. Since leaving Nottingham Forest in 1991 in search of regular first-team football, he has hankered after the big stage that hosts matches of true importance. His day is about to dawn.

Dyche, 25, will lead out Chesterfield in the FA Cup semi-final against Middles-brough at Old Trafford tomorrow. The game has other in the club's 131-year history. Before this season, Chesterfield had never progressed beyond the fifth round and had not even gone are just 90 minutes away from Wembley.

As a trainee at Forest. Dyche, a central defender, was surrounded by some of the most successful professionals of the day. The late 1980s saw Brian Clough assemble a side that included Des Walker, Steve Hodge, Neil Webb, Stuart Pearce and Nigel Clough and almost challenged for the title.

While he stayed on the right side of the manager, even to the point of helping Clough to tend the roses at his home in Quarndon, Dyche gradually realised that he would not break into the side. "I was Richard Hobson meets the Chesterfield captain finally making the big time

No 41 out of 41 professionals and, even though I had a lot of affection for the place and the people there, I had to leave." Clough smoothed his passage to Chesterfield on a free transfer, then managed by Paul Hart, a former Forest defender, whose thoughts on the game echoed those of his mentor. More than 200 League appearances later, Dyche still keeps the Clough

You find a lot of players leave Premier League clubs. as they now are, without getting near the team, but they have had such a good grounding they can cope immediately in another division."

The gulf between the big "Without any question, he clubs and the smaller fry was is the most amazing man massive then, but Dyche

the Coca-Cola Cup, as evidence that the gap is not widening as quickly as is commonly believed. Such a view is countered by the difference in carnings between Dyche and Fabrizio Ravanelli, the man he will mark tomorrow,

"His wage only affects me in that I wish it was mine," Dyche said. "To be fair, if his goals can take them so far in cup competitions and keep them in the Premier League, he is probably worth £42,000 per week."

Dyche missed the fifthround tie against Forest and was undergoing rehabilitation when the Cup was brought to Saltergate for a photo-shoot before the quarter-final against Wrexham. He managed to make contact with the trophy in a separate event with Tony Humes, the Wrexham captain. We were lining up for pictures and the guy from the Football Association said we did not have to touch it if we were superstitions. I just hugged it. I cannot see that touching a piece of silverware is going to make us lose a game," Dyche said. It was the only time that he mentioned the word "lose".

to come to terms with Anfield's problems BY DAVID MADDOCK

SITTING in the glare of television are lights after Liverpool's wretched 3-0 defeat in Paris, Roy Evans appeared transfixed by the events that had unfolded around him. Yesterday morning, after a fretful sleep, he had clearly still to come to terms with the implications of the reverse - their worst in Europe for 18 years - against Paris Saint-Germain in the first leg of their Cup Winners' Cup semi-final on Wednesday.

Evans has tried to explain away the performance, and admits that he cannot. His side was simply too slow, in thought and movement, against opponents whose own standards were out into perspective by a 6-1 home thrashing from Juventus earlier in the season. The manager's shock was perhaps an indication of a dawning that there are fundamental problems at Anfield that cannot be rectified this season.

All season, Evans has argued that Barnes and Redknapp can play together. just as he has insisted that Fowler and Collymore are compatible. The evidence of Thursday evening would suggest otherwise and the manager's abiding faith may be his

David James. He is a complex man, a player who thinks deeply - too deeply - about his performances and a player who thrives on confidence. That is shattered at present, but in indicating that the goalkeeper will still play against Sunderland tomorrow, Evans admitted that he has few alternatives.

The impression however that should Liverpool fail now, the question of why has it taken Evans until the final six games of the season to realise that he has inherent problems must b asked. It will be the board of directors asking such a question should Liverpool fail to finish in the top two in the gusta on Thursday, his first round at the Masters as a professional golfer, it was no exaggeration at all to feel the pull of destiny around him. The gallery he attracts is almost a danger to him and he admits "it gets scary when you look back and you see adults getting pushy, and little kids getting trampled down".

There is, of course, security. and Woods is already secure in the millions of dollars that the almost fanatical acclaim has quickly brought him. When he came down the back nine of this extraordinary course on Thursday - where he made an eagle-three at the 15th and birdies at four of the other holes - he became one of only 12 men ever to record 30 for those nine holes — six

After taking 40 for the front nine, his remarkable turnaround gave him a first-round score of 70, two under par. He will win this tournament if he sustains anything like that form. If he does not capture the Masters this weekend, then Jack Nicklaus and Arnold Palmer are all the wit-nesses you need to state that this young player will definitely be the master in the future.

We cannot begin to unravel the nature-nurture conundrum as to whether golfing ability this great is born or made. Allegedly, Tiger was six months old when people ob-served him eyeing his father hit golf balls into a net in the garage. He was two when he appeared on The Mike Douglas Show on US television, putting with Bob Hope. He shot 48 for nine holes at the age of three . . . and it goes on, then Tiger Woods the profiling of an infant stepped off the turning into a boy, graduating 18th green at Au-into a student at Stanford University and reaching the precipice of greatness as a slender 6ft 2in apprentice to the gods of golf.

His tournament winnings already top $1 million and are dwarfed by the $40 million per annum that Nike pays him to claim the very ground that he treads, to make him an icon. At 21, he has his own foundation and he intends, if ever there is time, to give clinics. Meanwhile, he is fully engaged, searching for something close to perfection, close to the round of 59 on his own local course that demonstrated his form coming into the

For one whose frame is almost whippet-lean, he produces a power that flies the ball farther than any of his fellow professionals. His right leg stands very square and strong, the power develops through the torque of his upper body and the swing is almost ferociously fast, but clean. It looks free of stress, free of mechanism; it looks like nature's work...

And when the course plays the devil's game with him. then a ball lips the cup, he shows exasperation. He blows out his cheeks and in an instant it is gone. The look in the dark eyes is that of a child momentarily thwarted and then, as if with a shrug of resignation, he marches on: the next hole, the next challenge to his destiny. People here remind him of Jackie Robinson, who, 50 years ago as a baseball player, broke the barrier of American sporting prejudice. Robinson, Woods is aware, was a very fine and obsessed golfer, also. When the phenomenon that is Woods is compared to the prowess of Bob Beamon, Carl Lewis, Muhammad Ali, it is curious that the name of Arthur Ashe is missing. Surely it is Ashe, who obliged people in the once similarly pristine, white world of tennis to acknowledge his game, his dig-nity and his intellect, who should be the role model for this modern-day sensation? There was something of

He picked out a seven-iron as he looked towards the top of the tall pines. "Initially, I was going to hit and hope," he said later. "Then I saw this little gap." Exchanging his club for a sixiron, he then deftly guided the ball through two trees and safely back into a playable position. Mathy, whose father was a member of Belgium's bronze medal-winning team at the 1976 Montreal Olympics, has been riding with increasing confidence since winning the Brussels Grand Prix on Shurlands Governor last November. MacKenzie leads in practice

NIALL MacKENZIE made an inspired start to his defence of the British Superbike crown by leading in practice at Donington Park yesterday, ahead of the double race tomorrow. The Scottish racer. 35, has the benefit of an upgraded Yamaha for the 22-race championship that has attracted five leading factory teams, with four former champions lining up on the grid.

The former champion. John Reynolds, riding the Reve Red & Bull Ducati, closed within four hundredths of a second of MacKenzie, while Terry Rymer, of Kawasaki, was marginally slower.

Ice hockey: The Great Britain head coach, Peter Woods, was in optimistic mood as he and his team embarked on the final leg of their journey to Poland for pool B of the world championships, which begin today. The team's preparations included one full-scale game, a 3-3 draw against Austria in Linz last weekend.

Golf: The second day of comperition at the 66th Halford Hewitt Foursomes saw the two teams many expect to contest the final tomorrow progressing into the third round with relative ease. Harrow recorded a 41 win over Berkhamsted at Sandwich and Radley also had little

RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

ENFIELD does not resound in rugby's annals as a fortress not compared, say, with Kingsholm or Bath's Rec-reation Ground. Yet no club has beaten Saracens there in the Courage Clubs Championship this season and it is the ground where Wasps, the league leaders, saw their Pilkington Cup hopes crumble back in January.

The short trip today from one part of north London to another, therefore, has even greater significance than usual. Wasps have been alternately cast down and buoyedup by the see-saw of league fortunes this month, yet the one plain fact is that if they continue to win, the title will be theirs and they can laugh at those who do not perceive them as championship material They take a XV unchanged from that which started against Bath last Sunday, a tribute to the players' fitness that Saracens - still without the injured Michael Lynagh would like to emulate. There are only nine survivors of the lost cup match and the quality of rugby that Wasps are playing is a couple of notches higher than Saracens achieved in their disappointing midweek game against Harlequins. Whether the Enfield factor - seven league wins and a draw with Sale -will lift them remains a moot point. Their fans will be lifted by a report that they are intrested in signing leuan Evans, the Wales wing.

The "Rec" at Bath has not proved so forbidding to opponents this year yet there is no doubt that the atmosphere for the visit of Leicester will be electric. This is the club that removed Bath from the cup, this the club that must win if the pursuit of Wasps is to be sustained and that returns to something approaching full strength with Niall Malone at full back, where he played so well in the victory over Wasps, and six British Lions.

By DAVID HANDS

IF THIS is the season for unfashionable teams, as Gloucester and Sale in England suggest it is, then Ebbw Vale will win the Swalec Cup semi-final against Swansea at Cardiff today. If, however, recent league form means anything, then Swansea will have in mind their 59-12 dismissal of the Gwent club last weekend and can make preparations for a final against the winners of the match tomorrow between Cardiff and Llanelli.

But Ebbw Vale are at strength this weekend and will remember their home league win over Swansea, by 13-9. "For us, it will be a fun day out," Kingsley Jones, the Ebbw Vale captain, said in the knowledge that his club has not been in this position since 1977. "But, when that first whistle blows, everything becomes deadly serious." Swansea hope to have Scott Gibbs available, after the

Wales centre's recovery from a neck injury, but are without Colin Charvis and Arwel Thomas. We are entering a much more difficult phase and we don't want to lose our momentum. I'm going to have to wring that last percentage point out of the car. It's a bit like squeezing a sponge. Castleford seek £12m new home

IT IS ironic that in troubled times on the field, Castleford Tigers, the club that has traditionally dragged its feet off the field, should be looking ambitiously to the future with plans to create a new $12 million 15,000-seat

An out-of-town site, at Whitwood, close to the M62 motorway, has been ear-marked for the development of a multi-use stadium and leisure complex, complete with an indoor ski village, Relegation by Castleford from the Stones Super League would hardly appeal to potential investors, although a London-based property developer has ex-pressed interest in funding the proposed "Snowdome".

The club has commissioned a leisure consultant to check the viability of the scheme and will approach Wakefield Council for funding for the 70-acre site before putting the proposals, that would involve selling their Wheldon Road ground, to a public meeting next month.

Castleford's hopes of winning backing from the local authority and the National Lottery are complicated by the support that Wakefield Council has given to the building of the new £50 million headquarters of Yorkshire County Cricket Club and adjoining joint-use stadium for Wakefield Trinity rugby league and Wakefield rugby union clubs, at Durkar, off the Mi motorway. For seven decades, Castleford have been making life generally inhospitable for visiting teams to Wheldon Road, which looks like it should have been condemned years ago. There have been a few recent improvements including a roof, a coat of paint for the toilets, an upgraded press box and new seats in the main wooden stand.

the season and ended a 25-year association with the club as a player and coach. Mick Morgan, the commercial manager, has stepped in on a temporary basis, but Castleford's losing run continued last Sunday at Sheffield Eagles. Lee Crooks, who has confirmed that he is in the running for the coaching vacancy, is missing from Castleford's front row because of a knee injury and Dean Sampson takes his place. Nathan Sykes also returns at prop.

Warrington, who began the season with a whimper, and reignited it with a bang by beating Wigan Warriors, and Oldham Bears at home, move Kelly Shelford to scrum half for Jon Duffy who is out for at least six weeks after he sustained a leg fracture. Chris Rudd is switched to full back as Lee Penny has a knee injury and Toa Kohe-Love returns at centre after missing the two recent victories.

Before the visit last night of Bradford Bulls. Wigan signed Lee Hansen, the Tonga prop, from Widnes, who have taken Sean Long and Matthew Knowles in exchange. Widnes, who are struggling three places off the bottom of the first division, also acquired Nick Devine, as a front row replacement for Hansen, on month-loan from St Helens.

Oldham, the only other side without a win, have Rob Myler, David Bradbury and Matt Munro returning from injury for the visit tomorrow night of Paris Saint-Germain, who have no choice but to turn to more French players with a number of iong-term injuries among their mainly-Australian

Chelsea confidence a credit to Gullit's press-gang tactics Faldo's dream

By OLIVER HOLT. FOOTBALL CORRESPONDENT

HIS playing days are almost said, Chelsea were now raring over but Ruud Gullit, the Chelsea manager, showed yesterday that his ability to turn football into performance art has not deserted him. For those who thought a kind of anarchy was settling over Stamford Bridge in the run-up to the FA Cup semi-final against Wimbledon at Highbury tomorrow, the Chelsea coach had all the answers. Never has "crisis, what crisis?" been paraphrased so elegantly and so bewitchingly. Some had gone to Gullit's press conference in west London at lunchtime yesterday to bury him, not to praise him, to hear him try to explain away the outburst this week from Gianluca Vialli, his Italian striker, about how Gullit had "humiliated" him, and to delve deeper into the rumours of a dressing-room screaming match between groups of players in the wake of Chelsea's third successive defeat, at Coventry City on Wednesday.

For the first time since he arrived in England to be hailed as the kind of renaissance football player the do-mestic game had been searching for, to be acclaimed not just as a great talent but a great thinker and an articulate commentator, Gullit appeared to be on the brink of suffering his first bout of sustained criticism. People were even saying that he had grown jealous because Vialli mer-own in the club shop.

Gullit admitted that he had orchestrated it all. He was blatant about it. He said he had used the press just as the press had used him. As he aughingly thanked everybody for their co-operation in his psychological games, he got some laughs, too, from a room full of people not accustomed to doing managers favours. His swingeing attack on the players after the 3-0 loss to Arsenal last Saturday morning was a ploy, according to Gullit, something he had picked up in his days at AC Milan and playing for the Dutch national team. Con-frontation, he had learnt, could hurt a player's pride and elicit a reaction from him on the playing field that would not otherwise have been to go. The matter with Vialli was settled, too. They had had a ten-minute chat after the Italian's comments and all their problems had been resolved. Vialli loved it at Chelsea, he added, and was keen to see out his contract. Things, in fact, could not be better.

"I think the arguing between the players was a very good sign, actually." Guilit said. "I have grown used to that sort of thing in Holland. Sometimes you try to get a confrontation, you try to get something out of the players. When Vialli came on as substitute against Coventry on Wednesday, he was different, he gave us a lot of spirit and I was really pleased with him.

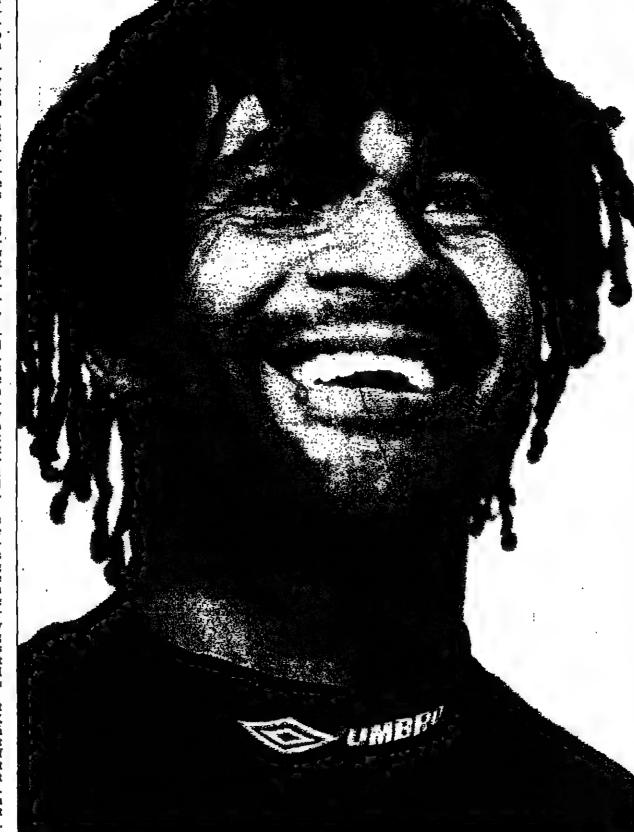

"It happened with Dennis Wise, too, at the beginning when I took over. It is incredible how well he is playing this year. Some players will not respond to the confrontation, others will not. I have never seen Dennis playing so con-sistently and off the pitch, too, he is a different person.

"This mentality of respond-ing to confrontation happened to me, too, when I was in Italy. who said 'Gullit is not what he used to be', so when I went on the pitch I made sure I performed so nobody would say that was true. Then, after a while, they were saying Gullit has knees of glass, he cannot play for more than two or three games at a time', so I went to Sampdoria and played week in, week out, and nothing happened.

Perhaps this method has something to do with the Dutch mentality. When Holland were playing, there was always something happening in the Dutch camp. We searched for the confrontation to get players reacting and the good players got angry, their pride was hurt and they wanted to show everything happened here, now. I did it all the time in the national team and Cruyff did it in his wanted Vialli to be hurt by what happened. He is OK now. We had a talk with each other and he said exactly what I wanted to hear. Of course, if he is not playing he is not going to be happy, but at least he knows exactly what I want. I have already seen things in him since our discussion that have pleased me as a coach. Sometimes you get compliments from the press and sometimes you get spanked but it is all part of the business. Gullit, though, has held back from taking the credit for the transformation that he is confident his team will show tomorrow afternoon. Much of the magic of the FA Cup has usually dissolved by this stage of the competition but the Dutchman said that he was astonished at the change the imminence of the match had wrought in his players. "I saw a different team in training today," he said. "The change in them was incredible. In the last couple of weeks we were not tuned in enough because we were so focused on The kind of attitude they had this morning has not been there for a long time. That is what I want for every game but maybe I demand too much. When I came here, because I wasn't born in England, I couldn't understand the obsession with the FA Cup, but gradually I am beginning to understand." Chelsea go into the match

Scotland's cricketers reach new heights

SCOTTISH cricket is celebrating the most momentous event in its history after the national team qualified for the World Cup at the first attempt by defeating Ireland on a faster scoring rate in the rain-interrupted ICC Trophy third-place match in Malaysia

However, before we are carried away with images of tartan armies marching on Lord's in the summer of 1999, it has to be pointed out that opponents for Scotland's happy, but largely weekend, band of cricketers in the group stage will include Australia. West Indies and Pakistan - and they are unlikely to bat with the abandon Hendrick, to call his men's performance "disgraceful".

While the team, captained by George Salmond, a teacher at George Watson's College, celebrated in Kuala Lumpur, there was also a warm glow around the Scottish Cricket Union's headquarters in Edinburgh.

"We have been inundated with calls and faxes from people congratulating us," Alex Ritchie, the general manager, said. "It will be absolutely marvellous for Scottish cricket." The players' many hours in a Strathclyde heat chamber to prepare for the humidity were clearly well spent.

Election campaigners may be debating political independence for Scotland, but cricketing autonomy was achieved in 1994 in the restructuring of the game in the British Isles. This, together with qualification for the World Cup, will bring a welcome injection of finance from the International Cricket Council's development fund and renewed interest from sponsors. The players had to pay their own way to Malaysia. Cricket has been played in Scotland for more than 250 years, but, although a Lanarkshire man, Mike Denness, led England in the Seventies, on the scale of Scottish sporting interest cricket figures below football and golf.

Putting was dominating the minds of all the players on the second day of the 61st Masters. After the difficulties of the first round, when a wind made the positioning of the flags so contentious, there had been a softening of attitude by club officials. The flags were more sympathetically positioned, the wind had dropped and the greens had been lightly watered to slow them down and make them a little iess firm. Consequently, the scoring was much lower. The outward nine, which the field had played in an average of nearly 39 strokes on Thursday, was merely difficult yesterday. Among those who broke par over its 3,465 yards were Tom Kite, Scott McCarron and John Morse, who were all out in 35. Warren Bladon, the Amateur champion, was out

He is not perceived in the same affectionate way as are his contemporaries, such as Gay Brewer and Billy Casper, who are both 65. To players and speciators alike, Palmer is not a 67-year-old man who once won the Masters. To them he remains the Tiger Woods of 40 years ago, the man who popularised golf.

Palmer was applauded every step of his second round and, as a mark of respect, his score was not put up on the scoreboard by the side of the 18th green. Just as well. At that moment he was 31 over par for 35 holes and he dropped another shot. No one among the crowds that come year after year wants to see him struggle. He looked desperately tired at the end of both his rounds and every footstep seemed to be an effort.

Peter Barnard on why teaching philosophy to children could change all our lives for good Children are encouraged to articulate ideas they didn't know they had, and weren't credited with having," says Clare Cassidy, who teaches philosophical inquiry (PI). "They sit there looking like miniatures of Rodin's The Thinker"

Little people, big ideas

misty-eyed tale of the day Alice or Thomas stopped pulling the wings from a butterily or kicking holes in the greenhouse and said something, well, pro-found. You won't believe what he/she said today! But you will believe it because there is no downward age limit on insight.

With education among the top four issues at the coming Celection, with teachers angered by league tables that seem to treat their schools like football teams, and with some of our children portrayed as the sullen, resentful inhabitants of a scholastic wasteland, surely anyone suggesting that we should teach philosophy in primary schools must be one textbook short of the full set. Yet this is exactly what is being mooted, though I say "exactly" at the risk of inciting a philosophical argument. The exact suggestion is that Thomas and Alice ought to be learning philosophical inquiry, or Pl. And the most enthusiastic advocates of this radical move believe that the teaching of PI could change the nation, empower future generations, turn back the tide of federalist very parent has a non-accountability. But before we get into that, we must explain the presence above of Daniel, in the company of Sartre. The point about the quote from Daniel is that it comes not from some precocious clever-clogs, but from an ordinary Glasgow boy out of an ordinary Glasgow home, a lad from a disadvantaged background.

And the point about the quote from Sartre is this: at the heart of PI is the belief that by teaching children to react to situations using thoughts and words, they will be much less likely to react using that stereotypical Glasgow debating point, a punch up the throat.

Catherine McCall, director of the Centre for Philosophical Inquiry at Glasgow University, is the leading exponent of PI in Britain. She will speak at an international conference on philosophy in schools at King's College, London, on Monday and Tuesday, but this gathering will not be a love-in for proponents of PI, because there are plenty of dissenters.

This dissent need not, however, detain us much. Nobody in the argument is opposed to children expressing profound

McCall's opponents are mostly sceptical about whether what she is encouraging is really philosophical inquiry or whether it is merely the ability to reason. This difference may be the core of the internal debate, but for most of us the apple itself is a lot more interesting.

Dr McCall is a philosopher in her mid-40s who encountered philosophy for children when she worked at a university in New Jersey. While there, in 1984, she ran graduate courses in philosophy for teachers. Most of those applying happened to be teaching first grade (five-year-olds).

She was fascinated to discover that even with children of that age you could get results. Dr McCail told me: "It works on the basis of a proposition being put and the children reacting with statements which begin 'I agree because' or 'I disagree because'. It worked brilliantly right from the start."

Dr McCall returned to Scotland in 1990 and applied her American experience there. She ran, and still runs, philosophy courses for teachers, and at present there are about 35 postgrad teachers in 20 schools around Scotland: Glasgow, Edinburgh, Renfrewshire, the

Borders, Inverness,

Parts of the philosophy estab-lishment regard Dr McCall as a maverick, but she is at pains to underline a degree of confor-mity: "I am not teaching children philosphy. I am getting them to philosophise. It's oral, spoken, not written and read. Philosophy is full of jargon, but this isn't. We are drawing things out of children, not putting things into them."

r McCall insists that these discussions have to be led by people trained in philosophy, so getting PI on to the national curriculum would be extremely difficult because of the number of teachers who would need to do graduate courses in philosophy.

PI seems to be easier to accommodate in Scotland than in England and Wales because the Scottish education system is more flexible, but Dr McCall believes it could eventually work anywhere in the UK, provided there was one qualified teacher to cover about four or five schools, and assuming some time could be found in the school day. There are about a ble to go into Space.' "Quite dozen schools in England, and honestly." Dr McCall says, "if dozen schools in England, and a similar number in Wales, that have used PI.

One of the more remarkable aspects of Dr McCall's work is that much of her focus is on "ordinary" children. Her PI programme is not a middleclass exercise aimed at bright children in the best schools. She has encouraged PI among disadvantaged children from poor backgrounds.

How does a PI session work? This is best explained by putting the quote from Daniel in context. Recently Dr McCall was leading (acting as the facilitator) for a group of primary school children. She starts by reading an extract from a book, usually, though not always, one of the books she has written for the purpose.

In this particular case," Dr McCail says, "the subject of magic had arisen. A girl named Gemma asked: 'How can a person try to make you believe that something is both possible and impossible at the same time? That was when Daniel said: Whether you believe something is possible or impossible doesn't mean it is. People used to believe it was impossiyou got that from philosophy students at university you would be really pleased." Clearly these children do not know Russell from Sartre, Descartes from Wittgenstein. It is likely that most of them never will, for PI does not presume to be a practice match for the big game called Philosophy.

So what is PI doing for these children? "They become better listeners," Dr McCall says. "They are more creative and skilled in hypothetical think-ing, they explore and understand the logical consequences of hypothesis. These changes have effects far beyond the confines of the discussion, because these skills help them in arts and sciences. The use of structure and their understanding of logic helps in mathematics, for example." All of which sounds very useful in terms of producing children who are better educated. But if we have learnt one thing in the history of mankind, it is that better education does not automatically produce a better, more civilised adult population.

Does PI offer some hope? "I think it does," Dr McCall says. "I have seen cases, among teenagers, where PI has had a marked effect; there have been amazing gains. We have seen diminished aggression, because these young people have learnt to reason with each other instead of becoming violent. In order to react they have to listen.

"Potentially, I can see enormous benefits to society, though some of the effects are completely unpredictable. If more people are thinking for themselves, and thinking deeply, they would be able to make changes, and we would have a more civic society. PI empowers people and it enables them to see through the rhetoric and the promises they get from officialdom. Of course, such a development would remove power from the centre. If people are thinking creatively, who knows what they might come up with?

Indeed. Given that the people who run our lives are not famous for encouraging us to think, a flood of funding for PI seems unlikely. Dr McCall went to Brussels on Easter month ago I devoted this column to the virtues of my local hardware shop, the one whose owner sells everything. My girlfriend went into the shop shortly after the column was published. She wanted some nylon string. Naturally, the hardware man had plenty of varieties of nylon string to choose from, and he also had several photocopies of what he was calling my advertisement" laid out on his counter. It turns out he does not "sell" everything: he refused to allow her to pay for the string.

My first reaction to this news was to indulge in a long and pleasant corruption fantasy. I don't think I'd make much of sleazester: my fantasy first lines tended towards the parochial and the small-time. The salad rolls in Percy Ingle are exceptionally good at the moment...", "I see that Broadway Wines has draught Guinness in cans. . . "or, "My, my, I do admire the service at Whitechapel Sainsbury's these days".

It is not that I can lay claim to any Martin Bell-esque standards of personal probity. I think my fantasies were so dismally limited because the freebie is such a small and fuzzy concept in the British shopping consciousness. Shopkeepers here hardly ever round down bills, offer samples or otherwise give their goods away. Or hardly ever to me. Restaurateurs do, occasionally - although I once worked out in an idle moment that I had spent £3,000 over three years in one restaurant and in that whole time only ever received a (smallish) cognac by way of a complimentary gesture. Clearly that restaurateur hated me for some reason.

In France, shopkeepers are always giving things away, or so I am led to believe. I have never been given anything for nothing by a French shopkeeper, but I have seen it done on the television. One of the staples of those adverts attempting to sell products by associating them with a swinging, continental lifestyle is the scene in which a good-looking person rushes around a colourful market simply lifting fruit off a stall and running away without paying. The stallholder invariably responds to shrug and a cheery wave. There is no doubt some sort of lost ruralidyll fantasy being played to here, a fantasy shared by many British people. None the less, to set such a scene in the average British market would be impossible - if the Nicole-equivalent ran around stealing their apples, the traders would be bashing in the windscreen of her Renault Clio.

FREEBIES

In Britain, the freebie traditionally extends as far as a squirt of perfume you do not want and do not like from a woman in danger of collapsing under the weight of her own foundation. You do, occasionally, get offered gratis lumps of cheese in very progressive delicatessens, and once I was invited to try a liqueur as part of some doomed experiment in a new off-licence with an optimistic view of human nature and an inadequate understanding of the licensing laws. I cannot recall ever being offered anything else. I don't know why. Something to do with the Enclosure Acts, early industrialisation, population density and Protestantism. I suspect. Or it could just be that shopkeepers here recognise that we are uncomfortable with the idea of being given things. Or maybe they are mean.

Thatever: the average British shopper reacts to a tray of trial cocktail sausages or a free sweetie as if they are being asked to take poison. The thought process usually goes,
"How many people are looking at me?" followed by, "What's the catch?" followed by, "No, better not, I pay me way, me". Men are more cautious than women, I think. Getting a man to accept a freebie is like getting him to accept a compliment — nigh on impossi-ble. The opportunities for practice are rare, but I am doing my best to make it easier. A while ago I spent. E10.27p on some fruit — I like fruit — and the man said: "Call it a tenner." "No, no," I said, scrabbling for change. "No, really," he said. "Really?" I said, already holding out the 27 pence. "Yeah, go on." he said. "You sure," I asked? "Yes." he said, exasperated. "Er, honestly?" "Yes, a tenner'll do," he spat, as if speaking through a mouthful of elementine pips (they say they're seedless, but they never are). With a furtive look around, I slid the change back into my pocket. "Thank you," I said. "Yeah, right," he said.

He has not repeated the gesture.

which is "as inner-city as inner-city Glasgow could be".

Miss Cassidy took an M.Ph at end of a session than when it Glasgow under Dr McCall to become a facilitator. "The children are encouraged to articulate ideas they didn't know they had and weren't credited with having." she says. "They all sit there looking serious, like miniatures of Rodin's The Thinker. You can hear a pin drop," she says.

"PI definitely builds confidence. I think that's helped by the fact that what the children are saying isn't necessarily their own opinion, it's a point of view, so they have a kind of anonymity. And the facilitator has to learn not to control, though you have to keep it philosophical otherwise it just becomes a char." Miss Cassidy end of a session than when it started, "which is great. because that shakes up pre-conceptions. It's impossible to say how PI affects people in the longer term, but I think it will always be with them, even if they don't continue it in formal groups".

Miss Cassidy and Dr Me-Call find excitement in the way discussions expand and go off at tangents. Recently Miss Cassidy led a group which began with the issue of whether Space dies, and moved on to what happens to people when they die. A child offered the presaic: "Body into coffin". Others identified the difference between body and spirit, which led to an attempt to describe the spirit. One child concluded: "The spirit is the hest part of you, that goes on." Well, that sounds philoallowing for Dr McCall's admission that "a roomful of philosphers will always have an argument as to what philosophy is". Children, it seems, have the wisdom to avoid that issue... Anyone wishing to arrend next week's conference at King's College, London, should call 0171-873 2231.

Cast aside those chunky sweaters this spring and lighten up your wardrobe with a range of fine-gauge knitwear, says Heath Brown

ention knitwear and it con-jures up images of chunky sweaters and cosy cardisweaters and cosy cardigans. But fine gauge knits are less bulky and light enough to wear in the summer. They are easy to team with this season's silks, sheers and chiffons and are also extremely versatile.

The colours should be muted and pastel: Lilac, baby blue, burnt orange and powder pink are among the favourites as well as creamy white, which matches the antique lace effects around at the moment.

Long and short-sleeved tops can be paired with soft skirts or trousers. Knitted dresses are good for those brisk spring breezes and thinner, long-line cardigans are easy to throw on at dusk.

The look can be classic with variations on the twinset, or more modern in crop-tops or singlets. T-shirt shapes in fine knit look smart and are more acceptable than the cotton variety for the office and for more formal occasions. A finer gauge knit can usually smarten up a simple outfit. Crew-neck tops with either long or short sleeves are perfect for wearing with a skirt or trouser suit.

It is not just tops and dresses that work well in fine knits. Skirts and trousers are given a softer, more glamorous feel that is both comfortable and stylish.

The lightness of fine knits makes them ideal for a layered look without appearing cumbersome. Cardigans look good worn over vests or scoop-neck tops, or when teamed with silks and thin synthetics to give an elegant, summery style.

Borde Hill is a good example of how the evolution of great gardens is cyclical. The famous plant collection at the garden was first established during the 1890s by Colonel Stephenson Clarke from the fruits of plant-hunting trips to the Himalayas and subsequent plant breeding, yielding such items as the most famous of all camellias, 'Donation', which the colonel mixed. which the colonel raised.

Now the garden is undergoing a renaissance, with new flower gardens that peak in the summer such as the rose, herbaceous and kitchen gardens that have been created during the last two years — following on from the spring and early summer feast of the "woody" plants for which Borde Hill has been so long renowned.

The Chiltern beeches that form the backcloth to other planting are just beginning to burst into leaf and offset the array of fine Victorian evergreens, such as cedars and

It is something of a surprise to discover a well-established woodland garden of nearly two acres on the outskirts of Edinburgh. The garden's longevity is represented by some now impressive trees - in particular specimens of the Deodar dar, yews and oaks.

There are some superb specimens of rhododendron 'Christmas Cheer', which has been in flower since mid-January and will continue well into April, contrasting with treasures such as a huge array of hellebores, scillas, and chionodoxas of which Greenfield holds the NCCPG National Collection.

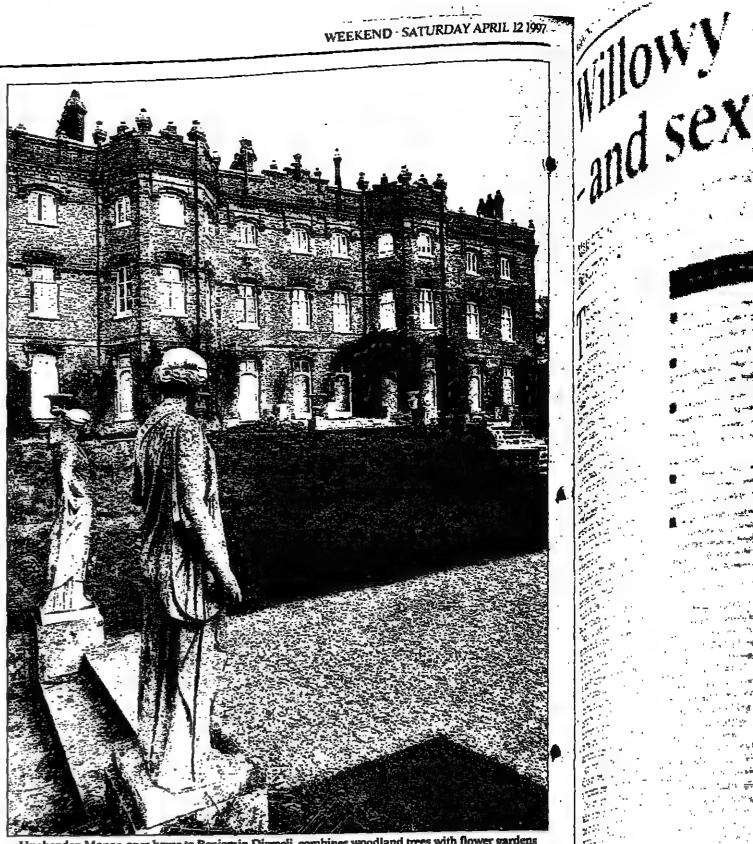

The garden is at its best during the spring, although later in the year the planting is cleverly arranged to cope with the semi-drought conditions that a few hot weeks invariably induce.

Willowy beauties – and sexy with it

Male and female spirex mate enthusiastically, which explains the surprisingly large number of varieties, says Barbara Abbs

fast-growing tree, forget Leyland's cypress and think about willows. While there is something awe-inspiring about a fully grown Leylandii 100ft high, there are few things worse in a modestly sized garden than the same tree confined as a hedge or hacked about. Many willows, on the other hand, grow with equal speed, and several look even better when regularly cut back.

Cutting back, or pollarding, how-ever, is not essential for everyone, Four years ago, Tony Thoriby, a retired academic turned landscape gardener and plant collector, decided that a pond would enhance the small field in the front of his house in Herefordshire. After much de-signing, calculating and damming, he made a mini-lake fed by an accompanying stream. He then thought a willow or two would look pleasant reflected in the water. Today, 100 different willows later, one of the first trees he planted is 20ft tall and several are more than 8ft. If his collection — there are another 50 different willows waiting to be planted out - grows at the same rate, pollarding and coppicing may be essential one day, but at the rooment he hopes to allow all the trees and shrubs to grow to their natural shape and size.

Apart from a few cultivars, villows are somewhat overlooked as ornamental trees, though basket willows are coming back into fashion on the ecological tide. The trees are diverse, fast-growing and beautiful all year. They can be any height, from 100ft to a few inches, have fine branches that may be red, yellow or purple, colourful catkins and leaves that vary from long and narrow, silvery or golden, grey and rounded, to a broad and glossy side railway lines or riverbanks, while small standards of Salix integra 'Hakuro-nishiki' make parasols of fluttering pink, cream and green variegated foliage. Smaller willows, such as S. helvetica, retusa and repens can be

Although growing most willows is easy, choosing one can be problematic. Salix species were among the first woody plants to appear after the ice Age. Being dioecious, with male and female plants, they mate enthusiastically, and have been doing so for a long time. The result is a large number of closely related species, subspecies, hybrids and varieties.

Identification is difficult. Often, only a magnifying glass will reveal differences. In addition, because of their long cultivation as a useful crop, there are scores of man-made cultivars, particularly among the osiers S. purpurea and S. viminalis. Willow wands are used for baskets, lobster pots and coracles, while branches and the trunks of

S. alba ssp carruled are used for cricket bata. Fine twigs make charcoal, Willows are also used to create living arbours, sculptures, screens, green walls on motorways and support for river banks, as well as for fuel — their energy-producing quality is high.

If you are buying a willow for its cations, get a male clone. The anthers of the male forms, which produce the coloured pollen, are more showy. Catkins, of both sexes, are surprisingly varied and long-lasting. Around the edge of Mr Thorlby's lake, the first catkins to appear are those of S. aegyptiaca, the musk willow, already 7ft-8ft tall after only three years. At first they are silky grey, then the male anthers produce a vivid orange pollen which later pales to yellow.

The long catkins of S. japonica are equally attractive; they are held horizontally and have marcon an-thers which turn red. S. acutifolia Blue Streak, which grows to 10ft after three years, has the palest grey catkins, which sit upright along purple branches.

ext there is S. gracili-styla 'Melanostachys', which is widely available and known for its black catkins and red anthers. This is not one of the easier willows to keep, and the catkins resemble wet cats' fur. It is one of the few that Mr Thorlby has had to replace.

In winter, against the dark twigs of the alders that edge the field, the orangey branches of S. alba and the silvery catkins on S. daphnoides stand out. The branches of S. alba cvs can be red. yellow, copper and brown, those of S. purpurea cvs are chestnutty purple; the violet willow, S. daphnoides, has branches covered with a bloom like spray from a can of silver paint.

In summer when the aiders are in full, dark green leaf, the golden and silver willows form an exquisite contrast. The silver willow and the gold-leafed willow S. alba var sericea, and S alba 'Aurea', are as eyecatching as flowering trees. Other attention seekers are S. 'Erythroflexuosa, S. babylonica var. pekinensis Tortuosa' (syn. mat-sudana Tortuosa') and S. udensis 'Sekka.' The first two are similar and have branches and leaves that twist like country lanes. S. 'Erywith warm golden bark and saffronyellow branchlets. S. 'Sekka' has broad, fasciated stems which look like coiled mahogany moulding.

long catkins and leaves which turn from rich green to bright yellow in autumn. Large weeping willows. such as Salix alba "Tristis" or S. x sepulcralis chrysocoma are magnificent all year.

Although Christopher Newsholme, the doyen of willow growers, with 245 species and 213 cultivars, and author of Willows: The Genus Salix, the most comprehensive guide to these trees (Batsford, £29.99), suggests some for drier areas - S. caprea and the weeping S z sepulcralis chrysocoma are among them — willows generally prefer deep, damp soil. They are adaptable, however, and simply remain on the small side if conditions are not ideal. For extremely poor soils the native sallows S. caprea and S. cinerea or their hybrids are recommended but, mostly, willows do not demand a highly fertile soil.

Many willows are easily propa gated: just stick a pruning in the ground and it will probably root, and in three years it will form a respectable shrub.

Something nasty under the pile

While rotting compost heaps are good news for the garden, Jane Owen finds that they can bring unwanted visitors

usan Matthews' approach to spotting a rat riffling through her compost heap was robust. She started an in-depth with her four children on Dick Whittington. And she called the rat catcher to her north Kensington compost heap.

Unless they reach epidemic proportion, rats in the country are normally tolerated whereas, in the city, when rats emerge into the open they have to be deterred. The rat catcher came within a day of Ms Matthews call, put down the anticoagulant warfarin, and is visiting every two days to take away any bodies and re-poison the area when needed.
"I started the compost heap when we moved to this house last autumn. and I use kitchen waste and a little cereal. In February I wanted to turn the heap so I lifted the bottomless container, forked it over and accidently left a small gap at the bottom where the rat must have got in. It burrowed a deep tunnel," says Ms Matthews, a lecturer who is married to the artist Matthew Meadows.

Three well-fed cats, regular habitues of Ms Matthews' garden, did not deter the rats, who continued to burrow in the heap even after a container was put in place, its sides pressed firmly into the ground.

Rodent determination is all too familiar to Bob Bush, chlef rat catcher for the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea, who has been doing the job for 24 years.

"The warmth will have attracted it along with the regular supply of food. Fat and grease attract rats, who are around all the time anyway, but emerge into the open when drains are broken or if their usual food sources become scarce. If rats aren't dealt with right away they will soon build up into an infestation," says Mr Bush, whose targest recorded catch was 20 in long, nose to tail.

"By law you have to inform the local authority if there is a rat infestation. Compost heaps can attract rats because of the smell of rotting vegetables. Mostly they live in sewers on human excreta. And that is why Mr Bush and his team, and all the other rat-catching teams, can use warrants to break into premises that they suspect to be infested: the threat of disease, from Ratus Norwegicus, is very real. If, like Ms Matthews, you have children, it is all the more worrying.

However, we should all want too," she says. For small urban compost heaps both to fortify the soil and to ease the pressure on state waste disposal systems. In Canada, the rat/compost heap problem is being faced with the production of wire mesh-encased compost bins although, if a rat is determined enough, it will gnaw through wire. But one of the compost queens of this country. Pauline Pears of the Henry Doubleday Research Association, at Ryton Gardens in the Midlands, is more sanguine about rats' relationships with compost heaps. "At Ryton, we get rats on the compost heaps in the far fields where they are rarely disturbed, either by visitors or turning the heaps. Turning a compost heap regularly can help to keep rats away and it helps the heap to compost more quickly

compost tumblers now widely available, which are lidded plastic barrels mounted on a frame.

Worm composts are also a good bet. Once a worm composter of 80-100 litre capacity is working at full strength (this can take a few months of gentle feeding instead of chucking vast quantities of compost onto the poor animals, who will simply be overwhelmed), it should cope with kitchen waste from a family of four.

s Pears uses one given to her as a wedding present - it is wooden and well insulated, which gets round two of the problems posed by plastic worm composters. The first is that plastic bins tend to retain too much liquid, because the plastic sweats. This means that they need to be drained regularly or the worms may drown. Ms Pears' bin, on the other hand, allows the compost to retain its natural moisture, without a build-up of liquid.

The second problem with plastic bins is insulation. In extremely cold conditions the worms in plastic bins will hardly work. Plastic containers probably have the advantage of being slightly more rat-proof than wood, though a really determined rat will simply gnaw through the plastic. However Clive Roberts, the director of the company that sells the Original Wormery, says that, after 100,000 worm bin sales. there has never been a rat attack of any kind reported.

Red-hot compost heaps will also deter rats. That means getting compost composting fast. Apart from the usual commercial compost accelerators, urine gets things moving. Original Wormery, with a 91-litre capacity bin costs E49.90, including delivery anywhere on the mainland (01884 841515).

GARDEN ANSWERS

STEPHEN ANDERTON replies to readers' letters

Q Can you tell me if Fremontia and Fremontodendron are the same plant? I would like to get hold of the variety Californian Glory'. -I. Bentley, Seaton, Devon.

The accepted name for Fremontia californica is now Fremontodendron californicum. It is suitable as an evergreen wall-shrub in Britain, and lives for ten to 20 years. The flowers are a bright yellow, and are produced through the second half of the summer. The variety 'Californian Glory' is a hybrid with the smaller, more orange-yellow and less hardy species, Fremontodendron mexicanum, but the hybrid is hardier than both parents.

Fremontodendrons need planting small, in spring, because they resent root disturbance, and need a light soil. 'Californian Glory' is available by mail order from Burncoose and South Down Nurseries, Redruth, Cornwall TRI6 6BJ (01209 861112).

Q Last autumn, parts of my lawn failed to recover after the summer drought. The cause was an infestation of chafer grubs. which were present over the lawn, even in areas still green. I must now relay the lawn. How can I eradicate them completely first? -J. Ford, Cheltenham, Gloucestershire.

A Garden chafer grubs are the white, C-shaped larvae of beetles. which hatch in summer, then in late summer/early autumn and spring eat the roots of turf grasses and other plants. In spring they are ready to pupate and then emerge as adult beetles. So laying a lawn in spring is not a problem, as the grubs should be pupating or flown. Soil preparation for laying a lawn may, however, provide the birds with a banquet. Chafer grubs are difficult to control with chemicals and, once you see the damage, it is usually too late.

HCH and pirimphos-methyl will kill the very young grubs when newly hatched, but would you want to treat a whole lawn? Better to spot treat if you see further activity again next

What red and green-leaved plants are best suited to topiary? I wish to make two lines of "red can" and "green cone" shaped navigational buoys across the vegetable patch. -P. Hughes, Airmyn, York-

A Red and evergreen is an impossible combination in this climate. But you could manage red and deciduous using the small Berberis thunbergii 'Atropurpurea Nana' (2ft x 2ft) or Helmond Pillar (4ft x lft). You might manage some thing in a simple shape with the bushy purple plum, Prunus cistena, too (4ft x 4ft). Perhaps if evergreen foliage is vital you could plant some Cordyline Torbay Red? You would get excellent contrast with clipped box or yew in between. Why not plant only greens permanently, and bed out red coleus cones every summer, if you want a touch of the exotic?

School rooms with real class

Once it was home to poor children. now it's called The Village and is a London pad for the wealthy

The whiff of chalk and the reek of carbolic soap have long since dispersed and its inhabitants are no longer schoolgirls in gymslips and pigtails. The Village, a converted school building in Battersea, south London, is now home to a group of glossy metropolitans, including a brace of minor royalty.

This former London Board School, built to provide space and light for Victorian children suffering from cramped and dingy conditions at home and at the child labour factories, now provides the same for, among others, Viscount Linley and his wife Serena, Michael Caine's daughter Natasha, and the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, The list of residents has much to do with the selection process originally imposed by the owner of the development. Ashley Nicholson, and is reminiscent of the New York condominium vetting procedures of which the more rumbustious celebrities keep falling foul.

As Grant Slatter describes the building work that went into his home, Apartment 16a - this is definitely not a "flat" - it is plain to see why he impressed the magisterial developer with his enthusiasm. Not content with a tiny entrance hall, Mr Slatter re-modelled it, which involved digging down an extra 3tt. The result, which has a pristine white limestone floor you would be sorry to drop a bottle of red wine on, means that you walk down a short staircase on entering and immediately up a short staircase into the drawing room. We wanted the seeling of making an entrance into this room," he says,

"and the stairs allow that." Not that the drawing room needs any help. At about 31ft by 21ft, with a soaring l4ft bin ceiling and polished wooden floor, it has the feel of a church, an impression reinforced by a-gallery at one end -

like an organ loft. This is not the property for you if you suffer from a fear of open spaces. Three fulllength windows are framed by elaborately draped cream curtains. The man in charge of furnishing fabrics at the Peter Jones department store in Sloane Square asked Mr Slatter how big his house was, and found it difficult to believe it was a mere apartment.

The scale of the drawing room has required monumental pieces of furniture. A 6ft bay tree decorates a corner where others might place a niggardly yukka plant; the carya-tids supporting the reproduction chimney piece are the size of small children; the stereo is ensconced in a towering Indian cabinet; convoluted dried flower arrangements made of moss and bare branches resembling exotic sea corals stand 10ft-high where bowls of pot-pourri might languish. The Slatters admit that decorating such a large space is difficult, unless you like the spartan, uncluttered look. Never the less, they have managed to furnish it without making nonne trick they have employed is breaking up the expanses of wall space with a series of framed prints hung vertically in rows, although it would take the whole of The Rake's Progress to make any impression on this kind of expanse.

The other rooms have more intimate proportions. The kitchen has forgiving under-cabinet lighting that lends early morning pallor a rosy glow. The cooker has a handy barbecue gizmo, which is useful because there is no garden, only one small flower bed. The Slatters claim not to miss a garden - "We go to Battersea Park" - and some may feel that their airy living reinforced by a gallery at one

The couple bought the apartment before they had a baby and are planning to live in the country with their son. This is, however, a property that might have been developed with a child in mind. The insulation (the walls are 12 feet thick) and the space (2,300 sq ft) render it noise-proof and play-friendly — it is not often one sees a large toy train track assembled on the floor without furniture pushed aside to accommodate it.

Original photographs of the school show Victorian children happily playing with hoops and toys, so I left the apartment with this small nod to the spirit of the building in mind.

It may be the most basic of materials but it has a bright future in green building, says Christine Webb

f you think of mud only as something you scrape off your boots, think again - mud could have a glorious future as the green building material.

This is not as far-fetched as it might appear. Mud is usually available on site and, when used unbaked, the only energy exerted in its production is the muscle power to wield a spade and perfect the mix. And when the building is no longer needed, it can be returned to

Yet, mud structures have impressively long lives. Many of our ancient character cottages are built from cob, a mixture of mud and straw, and some date from more than 500 years ago. Few of us realise that there are at least 170,000 earth structures in Britain, while an estimated 30 per cent of the rest of the world's population live in mud dwellings. Some in the Yemen are ten storeys high.

A couple of traditional British mud buildings have been re-crea-ted recently as "one-offs," but enthusiasts are promoting mud's potential, and say it could lend new form to modern architecture because it can be moulded into sweeping curves, lending fluidity to the architect's pen.

Linda Watson, of the Centre for Earthen Architecture at the University of Plymouth, believes we could be at the dawn of a British renaissance. This country has inherited a rich legacy of earth buildings," she says. "There are an estimated 40,000 earth structures in Devon alone, and buildings also survive in Lincolnshire. Scotland. Wales, Ulster, East Anglia, Cornish designers are finally starting to recognise that earth has a great potential." But, she warns, Britain lags behind other countries which are exploring this potential, including Australia, the southern states o America, Germany, Switzerland and France, where an experimental village of 35 houses. Domaine de la Terre, was built near Lyons, Four years ago, Plymouth University's School of Architecture started a comprehensive research pro-

Mud, mud, glorious mud

in Exeter, broke new ground in mud building by building regulation approval for an unbaked earth house he called the "Chiverstone", paving the way for similar houses to be built elsewhere.

Mr Stokes, a building control officer for Exeter City Council, applied for Local Authority National Type Approval (Lantac) for his house, designed in pise de terre (rammed earth), as part of his thesis for a degree in building surveying at the University of Glamorgan. And Dirk Bouwens, of West

Harling, Norwich, another building surveyor, recently won qualified approval from Breckland District Council, Norfolk, for a conventional-looking house built in unbaked clay blocks.

All new buildings must meet building regulations which, unlike planning regulations, ensure a structure is safe and satisfies minimum standards, for example of sound proofing and insulation. Mr Bouwens' type approval cerbuilder, could submit the Chiverstone plans throughout England and Wales without the need for further examination to gain building regulations approv-al. His design has provoked some interest from local builders, but so far has not left the drawing board. It would be built on a concrete foundation because he felt that was the most commercially feasible method. Metal shutterings are then erected, and earth is rammed between them to build up the walls 500mm thick. But Mr Bouwens' house has rubble foundations, which are traditional, and the detail of his house shows how it can be done. "The clay comes out of the ground at a certain density, you remove large stones, mix it with water, add straw and ram it into a mould. The harder you ram it, the greater the density," he explains.

You make a mortar out of clay and stick the blocks together. Traditionally the lumps are nine inches by six inches by 18 inches and weigh 25kg each, but you can make them any size you like. If you have them bigger than that people complain about lifting them. It's important the earth mix is right. It just happens that East Anglian earth has been readymixed by glacier."

David Fitt, Breckland council's

head of building control, says there were two sticking points to watch out for if this house was built — the U value of the walls and their sound resistance, which could only be tested if the house was built. For that reason the approval given was qualified.

thermal resistance, could be changed during construction if necessary by lining the walls with thermal boarding, or by making the walls denser, which would also increase sound insulation, Mr Bouwens savs.

"The principal problem facing the procurement of pise de terre dwellings is the unwillingness of builders to build them," Mr Stokes says. "The burden for relaunching unbaked earth build-ings in the UK rests with the Government. They have the reresponsibility for ensuring a transformation in building."

uilder Kevin McCabe. who has converted a three-sided agricultural shelter near Honiton, Devon, into his own cob home, plans to build a modern cob house. He has specialised in repairs or extensions for cob buildings since realising how much damage was being done by builders who used modern methods and materials.
"The problems of using cement to repair or render a mud wall might not appear for 50 years," he says. "Different methods are needed. It's a very economical material. But the beauty of cob is that it's hand-moulded and that's why cob cottages look so right in their environment. You can put the openings where they feel right, you don't have to have them all on a course of blocks. You can even sculpt with it. We've just moulded a life size Dexter cow into the wall of a new extension for a client." Linda Watson fears the profit motive prevents British builders considering earth construction, building's walls are only a small percentage of the whole build cost. She says: "But if Britain grasps the nettle and supports environmentally sound building, the day of earth

There are three main forms of earth construction: rammed earth or pisé de terre, cob, and earth blocks (wattle and daub uses earth but is not load-bearing). All three methods need protection from rain. which would carry the mud away. swear by adding cow dung to help the clay bind. It is layered wet onto a few days before the next layer is added. Rammed earth, which was "modernised" for the construction industry by the French in the 1980s, is an almost-dry mix of earth, gravel and clay poured into the gap between two sheets of shuttering, and compressed by ramming.

Earth blocks are made by pour-ing a mixture into moulds. The blocks are then bound to each other by a clay mortar. After 1800, this method was widely used in East Anglia, where it was known as clay lump. For 100 years it was the was used to build Norfolk's first

here are signs of a revival in earth building. One innovative firm of architects, Fielden Clegg of Bath. is using earth to build the front wall of the Earth Centre. which were not designed with earth in mind. But Alan Stokes, a gained building regulation type approval, and a clay lump house has had approval in East Anglia

Mr Stokes worked out the building costs to be £153.80 per metre for the earth walling compared with £274.98 for traditional materials, assuming the earth cost £4.50 per ton. If earth was available on site, the cost would be £136.74. He also undertook market research in the West Country, where people are aware of cob houses, and found that 74 per cent of respondents said they would buy a new earth the most commercial build form, adding: "People would need educating to wipe out the public conception of living in a mud hut." John Hurd, chairman of the International Council on Monuments and Sites earth structures committee, and a consultant for earth buildings, is convinced of earth's viability, "New building in earth is about to break in the UK," he says. "It's been happening elsewhere and we've been behind because our building rules have

PROPERTY prices are probably the last thing on a prospective Labour MP's mind at the moment but. according to agents Dauntons in Piralico, central London, they may be in for a shock. Property prices and rentals around Westminster have almost tripled since Labour was last in government, and there are few properties to be had. Dauntons estimates that a Pimlico pied-à-terre would sell for £89,000 today nearly £60,000 more than in state agents love them. Even conservationists give them the thumbs up. Americans cannot understand the fuss. To them, they are a basic life requirement.

Showers are a relative newcomer to the British bathroom. By tradition, we are a nation of bathers. But more than half of British homes have a shower, and the number is increasing. Recent research shows that the bothroom has displaced the kitchen in the show-off stakes; along with the living room, it is the room most often displayed to visitors.

Showers have come a long way from the trickle of the hastily-installed en suite variety. Thermostatic controls, power pumps, massage options and fancy Victorian heads mean showers can enhance a property's value. They are also quick and convenient. Families can be processed through the bathroom more speedily at peak times. Using only a third of the water and heat of a bath, showers are also economical -- a valuable point if a house is water metered.

The most common and cheapest are electric showers, requiring only a direct feed from the mains and an (isolated) electricity supply. Mixer showers draw water from the household hot and cold water supplies and give a higher flow rate than electric. Power showers (the most expensive) are mixer showers with a pump to boost the pressure.

The shower you choose is often limited by its location. Adding a shower to the bathroom allows the widest choice because the plumbing is already in place. But check your hot water supply. If this is poor or there are heavy household demands, you may be restricted to an electric shower. Thermostatic or pressure balanced showers prevent sudden temperature and pressure changes when there is a flurry of lavatory flushing or tap running elsewhere in the house.

A separate shower room, although more costly, can provide the most benefits in the long run - and you gain a second bathroom for guests or children. Provided you have access to drains and water supply, and you can accept the installation disruption, showers can be fitted in the most surprising places - under the stairs, utility rooms, walk-in wardrobes, downstairs cloakrooms, corners of bedrooms, atties and basements. (I know of one in the middle of a living room but this is not advisable unless you have an attractive shower cubicle.) A standard cubicle measures 700mm by 700mm. For comfort, you should allow the same area again for space to dry. Mixer showers, which draw cold water from the loft distern, need a minimum head of water - between 600m and

1,000m - so are unsuitable for attics. Windowless rooms may also need an extractor fan. Electric showers start as cheap as £50, mixers and power showers from £250, while £500 will get you power and sophistication. Installation costs will depend on accessibility but are likely to be several hundred pounds. Do not skimp on shower doors and panels (£200-£400). Cheap plastic will bend and leak. Power showers, in particular, need well-sealed units.

Forget foreign holidays - more people are staying at home and renting a little house in the country

A cottage industry at its best

are doing it - last year was a good year and on early indications, 1997 looks set to be pretty busy. Taking a short break or summer holiday in a self-catering cottage is increasingly popular. Whereas once the idea of a 'holiday home" conjured up thoughts of damp and rather spartan accommodation, there has been a move upmarket to provide a home from home, so now you get roses round the door and all mod cons.

The choice is diverse ranging from thatched cottages to castles and quaint seaside homes to country houses with swimming pools. Simon Tregoning. one of the partners in Classic Cottages, a Cor-nish-based company whose bookings leapt by 18 per cent last year, says: "There is a sway against being packaged abroad and people are looking at taking a holiday in their own country." If you have an attractive village or country property - whether acquired as an investment, inherited from a great aunt, or a weekend retreat that is no longer much used - it could well prove a valuable asset as a holiday cottage. On top of the income that can be generated from letting the property, there are a number of significant tax advantages worth exploring if you plan to turn your second home into a small holiday business. And if you're thinking about letting the house or cottage through a specialist holiday company, now is the time to contact them as many are assessing new properties for inclusion in their 1998 brochures that will be leaveded the accuracy. be launched this autumn.

Using a holiday letting company relieves owners of advertising the property, arranging bookings and dealing with payments. But what you cannot hand over is the responsibility for cleaning up between guests and keeping the property up to scratch.

If you want your cottage accepted by one of the glossier, more upmarket letting companies be prepared for a ore and more people are doing it — last year some money on fixtures and fittings to meet high standards. Some will present owners with a daunting list of requirements so you can forget about palming off that old swirly carpet for the sitting room or some dated crockery for the kitchen.

Nick House, managing director of the selective Rural Retreats letting group, rejects four out of five proper-ties he looks at, while Leonard Rees, who runs Quality Cottages in Wales, says that of 360 houses he was offered last year, he took only 36.

"We used to put old things into rented houses and buy new for our own. Now we buy new for the cottage and we keep the old," says Jenny Burr, owner of Fowlers Cottage in Sussex, a picturesque beamed house that dates from the 15th century. At the peak of the holiday season it costs £465 a week to book Fowlers.

Mrs Burr has rented out Fowlers for ten years through English Country Cottages. "I knew it would let easily but I loathed the idea to start with. Now I don't like it if it is empty," she says. She would not contemplate managing the lettings herself. "I would never get the bookings and could not afford to advertise. This way we also avoid the hassle of handling deposits and payments."

With the increased popularity of short winter breaks and new year bookings, a holiday cottage can earn its keep year-round, especially if it is in one of the honeypot areas such as the Cotswolds or the West Country.

Last year English Country Cottages, one of the largest companies in the market, reported a 20 per cent increase in winter season bookings.

Commission charged by letting agents varies. English Country Cottages charges commission of 25 per cent on the total rental price while Classic Cottages, with 320 properties across Devon and Cornwall, charges 23.5 per cent. Quality Cottages, which has around 150 properties along the Welsh coastline, charges 30.5 per cent. Rural Retreats charges a heftier

Jenny Burr at Fowlers Cottage. "I hated the idea of renting at first but now I hate it when it's empty".

33 per cent rising to 48 per cent, though this includes property management — cleaning and replenishing food hampers and toiletries that are standard in all the houses. On top of commission charges, the letting company will also levy an annual or one off registration fee of around £100. Other costs include public liability insurance for the property, which will mean a slightly higher premium than usual for buildings and contents insurance. One benefit for owners who use a letting company is that they are less likely to lose out if a booking is cancelled and will receive between 75 and 100 per cent of the income for the period concerned.

Advertising in a glossy brochure alongside a lot of other attractive houses may not appeal to all. not least because your house, however charming, is up against stiff opposition from other properties.

Putting an ad with a photo in the post office window may offer greater exclusivity but a probable viewing public of three men and a dog. Many holiday companies advertise and market their brochures widely and groups such as English Country Cortages also sell their brochures through branches of WH Smith and

In addition, many of the holiday companies are tapping into the growing demand from customers outside the UK, marketing properties through agencies in the US and Europe. Classic Cottages and Rural Retreats estimate that 10 per cent of their bookings come from customers

If you do decide to sign up, don't start planning your retirement straight away. Many houses take a couple of years to reach their peak helped by repeat bookings and recommendations from previous satisfied customers.

Martin Bell, the 'white knight' and son of a farmer/writer, would do well to heed his father's words as the electioneering mud flies

f you watched Martin Bell, the television war reporter turned frightened white mouse, as the press grilled him on his election intentions in Tation, you might wonder why he was doing it. Why should an individual as clearly possessed of a rational mind as Bell throw himself unarmed into a fight he can never win, whatever the outcome? If he gains the seat, he will be lumbered with a parliamentary career he does not want; if he loses he will never be allowed to live it down. Poor Martin; it's all a long way from the comparative peace of his lather's Suffolk farm.

Forgive any attempts at amateur psychology, but for an explanation of recent events in his life — there are some things in life that you don't enjoy doing, but sometimes like having done; I think it might turn out to be one of those" - the temptation is to examine the blood that flows through Martin Bell, a few drops of which famously remain in Bosnia.

His late father, Adrian Bell, has been an inspiration to me, and to readers of rural literature of the middle years of this century. He worked his small East writers were answering an irresistible call to the land. Among them was Henry Williamson, who farmed in Norfolk, and the literary critic and philosopher John Middleton Murray, whose distinguished work, The Conquest of Death, may be great reading for some, but for me there are more laughs in his Community Farm, an account of an idealistic attempt at socialist farming. It foundered, inci-dentally, when his idle fellow workers found that no amount of socialist thought could make light of the filthy business of harvesting roots in a wet October. Marx and mangelwurzels did not mix.

I have heard it said that this remarkable trio of larmer/writers, Bell (who also compiled crosswords for The Times while driving his Fordson tractor), Williamson and Middleton Murray, would generally meet at Beccles livestock market. Oh, to have been a blowfly three minds mulled over the philosophy of farming or, more whether Martin Bell on the farm, having once mentioned it briefly 1 did not get a re-rural upbringing counted for much. It worried me, because I. too, have farmed and written with a family tumbling along in the boiling agricultural wake. and am now beginning to wonder exactly which sins of the father will eventually be visited on the children. Martin Bell may be asking himself a similar question, if DOWN TO EARTH to get off our backsides and help people can be seen parental sin.

Reading Adrian

Bell's The Budding sonal account of wartime farming, despite its twee title, it is clear that Bell Sr. like son, was a torn man: Even in the engrossing task of writing; if I had composed a sonnet to rank with Shakespeare's, and it was running through my head, and I trough, I should have to risk forgetting it to carry a pail to the cow."

who would not rank his own creative powers above the brief thirst of a cow. should sire a principled son who would say that "I could think of lots of reasons for saying this is none of my business..." and then, through determination to do the right thing, stick his neck so far out as to be in grave risk of decapitation.

There may be simpler reasons. We are told by Bell Sr: "I send Martin L. across to take the apple that is slowly being brought forth, not from either pocker this time, but from under his hat. Martin is expectant, not knowing quite what Mr Merry is fumbling after in that old relic. 'Father.' He comes running after me. 'Mr Merry had an apple in his hat.' Martin bites into the apple. A thought strikes me: a mental picture of the inside of that hat 'Martin,' I call, 'here a minute.' But he has already taken three more bites. ['ll not tell his mother.' As a self-confessed "hopeless romantic", was it always intended that Martin Bell should take a bite of any tempting ople, even the poisoned one in Tatton? I wish him well: he is an intelligent man capable of ploughing deep furrows who will have great difficulty in the thin soils of politics. Doubtless it will be a ride as bumpy as any his father experienced on a tractor. There will be much mud slung in the next few weeks and, if it is any help to the younger Bell, it might be in the words of his father, who wrote after a muddy day's work pulling turnips: "I take no responsibility for the children beyond their bodily safety. Nothing will clean you, I tell them, but the mangel-scraper.' Anyhow, mud is comparative. A speck or two can be a tragedy on some occasions: when you are splashed from head to foot you forget about it. It is very unpleasant at the beginning. A thorough baptism is the only thing; complete immersion, and that comes soon enough. Thereafter one flops straight through anything." Tread carefully through the turnips. Martin.

The wilderness-like Cairngorms, scene of a bitter battle between the promoters of a mountain funicular railway and environmental groups

Fast track to conflict

In the Cairngorms, a funicular railway for skiers has been given the go-ahead, to the fury of environmentalists. Here we outline the two sides of a dispute with a much wider resonance lans for a funicular railway hauled by cable along a 6ft-wide zip up the front of Cairn Gorm mountain outraged some environmentalists, but now the scheme has the blessing of Scottish Natural Heritage (SNH), the Government agency and arbiter on Scottish environmental issues. Supporters insist this should allow the project to proceed without a costly and delaying public inquiry.

Earlier objections by SNH were withdrawn after reaching a legally binding agreement with the developer. Cairngorm Chairlift Company: the landowner, Highland and Islands Enterprise; and the planning authority, Highland Council. The Section 50 agreement should ensure that the natural heritage of Cairngorm and the sensitive areas close to the funicular track are safeguarded. The railway, costing more than £17 million, will replace the chairlift, which has taken skiers and summer visitors up the mountain for the past 36 years and has reached the end of its lifespan. After considering the alternatives and having lengthy negotiations with groups involved, the lift company opted for the funicular. It says this will whisk 1,200 skiers an hour up the mountain, more than double the present maximum. The trip will take four and a half minutes, against the 17 minutes taken by the present chairlift, and the railway, with its two-metre wide track. will be less vulnerable to the high winds that can sweep the face of Cairn Gorm. In summer, the funicular will be fitted with seats and cruise more slowly along its tracks to give visitors more of a "Highland experience".

The ski area occupies I per cent of Cairngorin's 167,500 acres and has an established network of 17 lifts and tows, used by up to 200,000 skiers in winter. About 50,000 visitors use the chairlift in summer, and the system helps underpin 2,500 tourism jobs in Speyside, where the lift company is the area's second largest employer.

Now the environmental battle has been won, in the view of the scheme's supporters, the cost and viability of building the funicular will most likely be brought into question. The estimate of £16.5 million made about three years ago seems likely to have increased towards £18 million. The promoters, supported by the Scottish Sports Council, Scottish Tourist Board, Scottish Civic Trust and local organisations, are happy with the sums and convinced the scheme is necessary and viable. They claim cross-party support, so even a change of government should not jeopardise their expectations.

Approaches are now being made to private and public sources in Britain and Europe to fund the funicular, with the aim of starting work in spring 1998.

The developers say disturbance will be kept to a minimum during construction, with helicopters used to transport materials and any disturbed ground reinstated. But the rift remains with those who object to the crowds. machinery and erosion that development inevitably attracts to sensitive wilderness areas. The thousands who enjoy skiing believe that when development is concentrated in one, relatively small area it is a price worth paying.

Roger Crofts, the chief executive of Scottish Natural Heritage, said the deal was legally enforceable and met Government obligations under the EC habitats directive. The claimed "better alternative" of a Glenmore Gondola. proposed by the RSPB, the National Trust for Scotland and other objectors, was rejected as flawed by the chairlift company.

It says the scheme would be more environmentally intrusive, on land notified by SNH as a Site of Special Scientific Interest. It would also affect part of the mountain where there was no skiing. More significantly, the gondola plan would not prevent passengers walking from the top station out on to the sensitive areas that need protection.

"The funicular

will give visitors

a Highland experience'

The funicular railway would rise more than 1,400ft from the present car park, via a new middle station with a new restaurant, to the Ptarmigan top station beneath the 4,084h summit of Cairn Gorm. The final 800ft would be through a tunnel, avoiding the funicular breaking the skyline.

At the Ptarmigan, a second, 250-seat restaurant is planned, with an interpretive centre giving visitors an insight into the history and ecology of the Cairngorms and, on a fine day, superb views across Speyside.

The scheme's supporters say it is crucially important that the Ptarmigan would have no summertime exit for visitors. Only the emergency services would have easy access to the sensitive plateau area. Anyone wanting to climb Cairn Gorm would have to start at the bottom - on foot.

t is the simplest of issues, but bureaucrats have strewn its path with reports: politicians, councillors and other vested interests have sought to layer it with complexities; even the conservation lobby was deluded into campaigning for a lesser evil, a gondola instead of a funicular railway, on the grounds that it would lessen the impact of skiing. I don't buy any of it. I acknowledge only this fundamental: is the landscape of the Cairngorms worthy of our highest conservation endeavours, given that its vast Arctic-Alpine bulk is the one massif in our country deserving of the accolade "unique"? I align myself with overwhelming international scientific and conservation opinion which has answered yes to that question and urged us to treat the

Caimgorms accordingly. If you believe that, then skiing can play no part. No funicular, no gondola, no car parks, roads, building. Nothing. The Arctic plateaux of the Cairngorms are the most fragile of environments: characteristic wildlife communities, like the dotterel breeding grounds, will be trampled underfoot, and possibly obliterated by skiing development. A funicular railway is not a means of safe-underfoot' guarding the moun-tain; it is not even a means of improving the quality of the skiing; it is a means of making money out of tourism.

and argues with the force and passion of which it will now be capable that skiing should be

That Scottish Natural Heritage's (SNH) satisfaction with the funicular's revised arrangements for visitor management means one of two things: either it values tourism above the single most spectacularly natural piece of heritage in Scotland (in which case the SNH has no right to exist and should resign), or it is too enfeebled to fight. No other explanation seems credible. If the one agency charged with advising the Government on nature conservation cannot mount the longest, loudest defence of the Cairngorms, of all places, what is the point of it? am against all skiing in the Cairngorms. The landscape matters too much. It matters not because of what you or I can get out of it (and at its best its spiritual and physical rewards are mighty forces in the body of a susceptible mortal), but for its own

The developers, even the Government which inflicted skiing on the Cairngorms in the first place through the Highlands and Islands Develop-RONALD FAUX Yet it has always been a fickle and unreliable employer. You don't make a fortune in the Highlands when your enterprise is dependent on the weather. Is there a better way? I think so, one which puts the landscape first, creates reliable jobs for all time, and could even save the face of SNH. Suppose SNH is infiltrated by a more enlightened leadership than it enjoys, a passionately Scottish one as opposed to the passion-free and un-Scottish incumbents: true champions of a native landscape are the natives.

The first step freezes the funicular in its tracks. The second step is to commission one more study: the potential for employment in a nationally funded Cairngorms-wide programme of rolling conservation, a benchmark which would establish more commitment to the cause of nature conservation than we have ever dared to contemplate. In such an endeavour is also to be found the key which will unlock the regeneration of rural communities, without unflattering and slavish addiction to tourism.

When this study demonstrates the undeniable long-term The wildlife advantages for the Cairngorms landscape and its people, SNH goes back to the communities Government (a Scot-tish Parliament will will be trampled have been in place for some time by now). points out past errors,

So the landscape is in better heart. the communities round its fringes are in better heart and have a stake in the landscape's well-being. And people as species have begun to look at the Cairngorms as an opportunity to put back something of what has been

None of all this will happen unless we want it badly enough. That's all that stands in our way.

Male wrens build as many as five of their domed nests in different parts of their territory

THIS IS a busy month for male vrens. These tiny birds of the undergrowth are singing furiously to warn off other males from approaching their territory, and will face them defiantly with lifted, quivering wings if they come too near. Sometimes, two males will fight over a boundary, and you see them scrabbling and tumbling together down through the leaves.

In addition, the male wrens are building nests - often as many as five in different parts of their territory. They are substantial, domed nests of grass and moss, and are hidden in ivy. cracks in sheds, or in other camouflaged crevices. These nests are called cocks' nests, and are used to attract females. It a remaie comes into his territory, a male wren will try to conduct her to one of the nests he has built, singing in order to lead her on. She will inspect it, and after that may remain with him as his mate. Later she may use the nest to lay her eggs.

Many male wrens remain monogamous after they have been accepted by a female, but some will end up with three or even four mates. They are so preoccupied with all this business at FEATHER REPORT

present that it is easy to get close to them. They are not much more than three inches long, and when they have their tails cocked they look even shorter. On a near view, you can see the fine barring on the rich. russet-brown feathers, the white throat, and the creamy stripe over the eye. The coat of feathers is thick and warm, When the birds are nervous they bob up and down, and when they sing the whole body seems to shake.

A FEMALE wren will lay as many as ten eggs in the nest. tiny white eggs with red spots. She will incubate them herself, and will not get much help from the male with feeding the young. The adults like eating beetles, but the young get smaller and softer insects. If the mother finds a beetle while foraging for the young she will swallow it herself.

It is an amusing sight when the young leave the nest, putting their heads out and streaming off one after the other. They hide together in a thick hedge at first, and dur-ing the few weeks before they become independent the male

will sometimes feed them, espe-cially if the female is starting to lay another clutch of eggs. However, some females find a new mate for their second broad, and then there is a game of musical chairs among the wrens in the neighbourhood.

There are many species of wren on the other side of the Atlantic, but our wren, whose scientific name is troglodytes or cave-dweller, is the only one found in Europe. It is very common indeed — in fact, it is probably the commonest bird in Britain, with perhaps seven million pairs nesting here. This often astonishes people. because it is a furtive bird and not so often noticed. But its rapid, vibrant song, with a passage of deep, throbbing notes in the middle of each outburst, is very distinctive, and if you get up at dawn in almost any kind of habitat just now, it is likely that you will hear them singing all around.

Mr and Mrs Cook had tried many ways to relieve her of the discomfort; special pillows, infra-red lamps, corsets, knee and ankle supports, along with private physiotherapy and even acupuncture.

Nothing seemed to give her any prolonged relief and certain drugs had side-effects which seemed to add to Mrs Cook's problems. Then one day, Mr Cook read of how a precision-made intra-sound device, manufactured in Denmark, had brought relief to sufferers of conditions similar to those of his wife. Within a matter of days Mrs Cook could feel the difference and the more she used the product, the more mobile she became.

To Mr Cooks amazement and absolute joy, within a week, Mrs Cook was actually able to join in the dancing on holiday! No more pains in her shoulders, no more aches in her hips and knees. Mrs Cook no longer needed help dressing and was even once again able to enjoy playing the piano. Within a mouth such was the improvement that she was only using Novasonic once every three walk in the woods is a walk in the woods. But taken at the side of Christine Reid — a woodland officer from English Nature - and all the signs indicating whether a patch of wood is ancient or modern will be pointed out in the time it takes to skip to its farthest side. "It's not so hard," she says. "You look for the identifiers."

If you go down to the woods today

She leads me up the edge of Hayley Wood near Longstowe in Cambridgeshire on a fly-blown day and nods to the raised bank and ditch which rims the wood from the field. "Small woodbanks are fairly typical of ancient woods," she says. They would have had pollard stumps and woven fences to keep animals from getting in and out."

Miss Reid is passionate about our ancient woods. She has drawn up free easy-to-follow pocket guidelines to help the lay woodland-walker get an historic angle on the woods they romp through or even own. "Ancient woods are the best examples of woodland for wildlife in the country. If the sometimes tiny fragments are identified they can be treated in ways appropriate to their status. I'm often called by people who have bought a wood and they say 'We don't know much about it but it's got bluebells and oak trees ... it must be ancient.' That's not always the case."

Ancient woodland, by definition, has been wooded continuously since at least 1600. Modern planting began after that date, so if the wood was there by then it's likely to be old or a remnant of the wildwood which covered most of the country 7,000 years ago.

Two types of ancient woodland exist. "Semi-natural" is untouched and composed of native trees oak, ash, maple, hazel, beech while "replanted ancient woodland" has been wooded continuously since 1600 but the original cover has been replaced with planted trees (often conifer).

Not much ancient woodland survives. Since the 1920s, 38 per cent was felled or replaced with conifer. England's total woodland cover is 7.5 per cent (compared with a European average of 29 per cent). About 20 per cent of that survives as pure semi-natural ancient woodland. The biggest problem is the ancient woods are so fragmented." Miss Reid says. There are patches There are patches

all over the place. Most are in Kent and Sussex but there's a lot in Cumbria and the Whey valley in Wales. Ancient woods in Cumbria drip with moss and lichen because the climate is so wet."

English Nature sends out free county-by-county inventories which map ancient woodland down to two hectares (five acres). But it knows there are many small scraps under two hectares. Only by cross-referring early Ordnance Survey map evidence (first edition 1809 reprints available from David & Charles publishers) with the field guidelines, is one able to identify the ancient from the not-so-old.

Miss Reid takes me further along a rambling path. We know Hayley Wood Nature Reserve is ancient because it's mentioned in the Domesday Book — if you wanted to graze 60 pigs there in 1086 it would cost two shillings per annum. She points to the random spacing of the trees and the multi-stem bushes of ash and hazel trees which rise to 15ft in wildish clumps.

standards — the tail trees cut for timber are typical ancient features," she says. Coppicing is the old practice of cutting non-standard trees to the base every ten years. This allows sunlight to reach the woodland floor much more than in woods planted with conifers like juniper and yew which have a dense evergreen cover of needles.

"This makes the ground flora so special," she says, scooping her hand down to an oxslip. They're a bit like a primrose and bit like a cowslip but exslips have a drooping head. You don't find them outside ancient woods."

She lists rare plants that thrive there: wood millet, yellow archan-gel, spotted orchid, bird's nest orchid and the insectivorous lords-and-ladies flower. Yellow brimstone butterflies, commas, and white admirals do well in the glades of ancient woods which often follow the natural course and depressions of ponds and streams.

Bluebells, of course, are another ancient identifier. "You don't really get wonderful carpets of bluebell in non-ancient woods," she says. "You can't find them in Europe. Their woods are managed more than here. People come from all over the Continent to see something which is quite special."

say the ancient wood has an untidy feel. Stunning 300 to 400year-old oak trees are wizened and twisted. There are dead tree trunks lying on the woodland floor greening with moss, "That's a bit of a loaded statement," Miss Reid says. "It's very good for wildlife. It creates lively habitats for bats and woodpeckers and dormice."

We walk to a triangle of Hayley Wood planted in 1922. The trees are more or less the same height and evenly spaced. "There's a different feel to this place. It's more regimented, more orderly," she says. Old ridges and furrows underfoot are a sign the land was ploughed as farmland not so long - and, therefore, a recent addition. Ancient woods have sinuous irregular boundaries. They're often along parish boundaries or adiacent to common lands and heaths. It's rare to find them bound by straight lines and their names incorporate old words for wood -"grove", "hanger" and "lea

English Nature would like to link nearby fragments of ancient woodland and encourages owners of replanted ancient areas to replace conifers with native broadleaf trees.

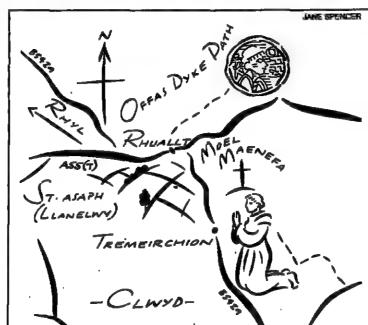

Miss Reid says: "The finy fragments are so important because they store rare seeds and species which can be passed by birds along corridors of hedgerows to the larger ancient woodlands. When I walk through woods like Hayley Wood I am struck by its sense of history. The old trees give us a sense of time. I find it amazing that the wood has been used for

The appeal: My parents used to live in the monastery of St Beuno's below. The Jesuit poet Gerard Manley Hopkins studied for the priesthood there. He saw his "windhover" on this hilltop. The cross on the summit has become a place of pilgrimage.

Historical interest: The hilltop is part of Offa's Dyke, the boundary reputedly established by King Offa between Wales and Mercia in the 8th century. There are remains of ancient forts and tumuli.

Best time to visit: Spring when the slopes are clad with gorse and foxgloves and the "windhovers" hang against the wind. They are watching for the rabbits whose burrows riddle the slopes. OS reference: 087743 (Landranger 115)

Don't sneer at Rhyl and rarebit, it's now seriously hip to be Welsh. Alex O'Connell reports on a rising cultural identity stood for election in 1992, being Welsh was about as cool as a camping holiday in Rhyl. In a country more associated with rarebit and Ruth Madoc than the future of British politics, he was best advised that the way to gain support was to tame his lilting accent and play down his home town connections.

But in the past five years there has been a defining of Welsh cultural identity and a resurgence of nationalist spirit Plaid Cymru, the second strongest political party in Wales behind Labour. Is expecting to increase its voting power this year.

The Welsh arts scene is booming and if London is swinging then Newport and Swansea are gyrating so fast that dizzy city dwellers are having to sit down. The Union Jack has been heralded as the fashion print of the summer. but the seriously hip are wrapping themselves in the Red Dragon and wearing daffs on their lapels. Tear yourself away from the pull of S4C's cult soap opera. Pobol Y Cum, for long enough and you will notice that there are Welsh characters in East-Enders and BBC2's Nineties real-life drama, This Life. Both are pasty, whining and rather unlikely romantic characters. but they both break television tradition: they aren't miners and they don't sing in the industry also reflects this trend. So Abersoch may not be the new Cannes, but Welsh Film Festival promoters are expecting more visitors than ever this year. Urban Wales is at last getting a look in. Karl Francis's Streetlife, written for Screen One, and Mark Evan's House of America discuss Welsh inner-city existence, while the independently made film Twin Town dentity made film Twin Town (co-produced by Trainsporting team Andrew MacDonald and Danny Boyle and directed by Kevin Allen), is set in Nineties Port Talbot and Swansea. Hollywood has also jumped to attention — there are rumours of a film about a colliery in South Wales starring the very un-Welsh Michelle Pfeiffer and Nick Nolte.

Even established Welsh stars like Tom Jones are reaching new levels of cultural recognition. He has always strutted over the cross-generational divide, attracting diverse audiences from the Sixties teeny-hoppers who first wobbled to Delilah, to the twenty-somethings who remember his ironic cover of Prince's Kiss, but in Tim Burton's pre-millennial dis-aster movie, Mars Attacksi, he has reached a new generation. For the soundtrack to the alien invasion. Hollywood producers favoured Jones's quiet crooning of It's Not Unusual over the usual bleeping

There was a time when Aled Jones was the nearest the Welsh got to Top of the Pops. Although Walking in the Air had every choirboy in Britain shricking into a tape recorder. wearing jeans on Saturday Superstore and meeting David Bowie does not a pop star make. But there is no doubt that Wales is exploding with talent. As tabloids dub Newport "the new Seattle" and the word "Britpop" is deleted from style glossaries, the unlikely catch-words, "Taff-pop" and "Daif-rock" fill the fanzines. Weish pop group the Manic wood in Gwent, cleared up the silverware at last month's Brit

Awards. Fiercely nationalistic, they dedicated their last al-burn Ewrything Must Go to the Tower Colliery in Cyon Valley, South Wales (bought out by miners and put back in operation). On their last tour, album.

they projected Dylan Thomas's poem, I See the Boys of Summer, on to the stage backdrop while bassist Nicky Wire took to hanging the Weish flag over his amp, later cloaking himself in it to collect the Brit Awards. The group are anxious to work on a film script on Owain Glyndwr, the Welsh William Wallace, procurer of self-rule in Wales. Everything Must Go has shifted 350,000 copies and the band are on a lap-of-honour tour. Even Kylie

The lesser-known Pembrokeshire band, Gorky's Zygotic Mynci, play traditional instruments (including a crumhorn and a shawm, a medieval reed instrument) and many of their songs are written in Weish.

Their latest album, Barafundle, is named after a beach in South Wales. At their Cardiff gig on St David's Day, the audience pinned daffodils to their T-shirts and, although most only spoke English, they sang along to the Welsh an-thems with gusto. Graham

Noone, bassist in the Newport band FUCD, who runs the Tuesday night local band slot at Newport venue TJ's, says most of the bands that have passed through his doors. including the Manies. Gorky's, 60Ft Dolls. Dubwar and Super Furry Animals, consistently return to Newport. They love Wales," he says. "OK, so it's a depressing place, but that's why people are so enthused and getting on with

He denies the rumours, for the record, that Newport is the new Seattle. "It's Newport, actually. A lot of the music here is rock-based, too, but there is really no comparison." He says Cardiff is too much like London, and prefers Swansea and Newport. "When you play in Cardiff people tend to sit down and clap a bit, here in Newport they go mad. Most of the audience are members of other bands, they all record at each other's studios and go to each other's clubs. We all know each other." This familiarity extends to the theatre world. The actor Michael Sheen and Swanseaborn writer-director Simon Harris went to the same Swansea theatre school and they formed the Weish theatre company. Thin Language, together. Harris's play Bad-finger, directed by Sheen as part of the Four Corners season at the Donmar Warehouse and about to be taken on a Welsh tour, was partly financed by a string of pals that reads like a valley boys' Who's Who: the Manics, the Kinnocks, playwright Julian Mitchell. actor Anthony Hop-kins, footballer Mark Hughes and the nominally Welsh football player Vinnie Jones.

Like his pop peers, Sheen's heart is still west of London and he has hopes of creating a theatre there. "I am based here now, I have to be," he says, but I go back home to Port Talbot whenever I can."

The highest number of self-employed in the country are residents of Plaid's four Mid-Wales seats. Although some of these are more likely to sub-scribe to Farmers Weekly than The Stage or NME, there are also extraordinary numbers of self-motivated artists and crafts people.

Do these figures suggest Plaid Cymru might benefit by activating this talent to form a Welsh Red Wedge cum Rock the Vote? "So far we have actor Phillip Maddock campaigning on the streets, but that's about it," says a man in the Plaid Cymru office.

The guitarist of the Welsh pop group Catatonia lives with Hywel Wigley, son of Plaid president Dafydd, but the party thinks the chances of the band singing from the back of an election trailer are slim: "I'm sure they are much too busy partying in Swansea."

f a man's best friend is a dog, then it should not come as too much of a surprise to find that a goose can forge a relationship with a goat, and a horse with a cat. And it certainly comes as no surprise to Dr Roger Magford who runs Ruxbury Farm, an Animal Behaviour Centre to which vets can refer their problem patients whose conduct needs

"Most animals are social and they look around for others of their species to bond with." Dr Mugford says. But when an animal is denied contact with its own species, it will seek friendship elsewhere and, as a result, form some very unusual relationships." These cross-species associations are the basis of our relationships with domestic pets — especially where there is only one animal in the household. "If we want to have animals as pets and feel they love us, the penalty we have to pay is their dependence on us." he says.

The relationship, according to Dr Mugiord, is one of social commensalism where pet and owner obtain benefits from the other without either being harmed.
"In the case of Chippy, a goat, and Nobby, a goose, I think the goat gets more out of the relationship because he is my only goat. Nobby does have two other geese for friends. But the goat does protect the geese from dogs." Bonding between different species can have many benefits including the avoidance of traditional animosities if the animals are introduced at an early age. A puppy brought up in a house with cats will pal up with the felines rather than declare war on them.

Basil is a fox who likes nothing better than to curl up on the sofa with his friends - the other cats and dogs who live at the Capricorn Animal Rescue Centre in North Wales. Rescued as a day-old cub after he was abandoned by his family ten months ago, he was bottle-fed by staff and treated like a puppy - even being taken for walks on a lead. A diet of tinned dog food completed Basil's domestication.

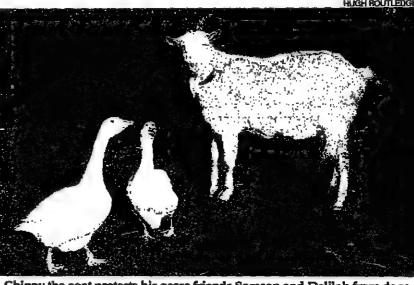

Stuff at the rescue centre doubt that Basil will ever be returned to the wild as he does not have the skills to survive - he is even frightened of chickens and other fowl. A rescued gander picked up the young cub by his tail and carried him around the centre. That left a lasting impression on him and he's afraid of anything with feathers," says Sheila wart, manageress of the rescue centre.

Such displays of animal magnetism are also evident in horse-racing. Nearly every trainer has a tale to tell of a horse who grew dependent on another animal for friendship tincluding sheep, goats, donkeys and even a pigeon). In many cases this resulted in the companion animal enjoying a day at the races.

Remittance Man, a highly strung elding and winner of the Queen Mother Chase at Cheltenham in 1992, cannot bear to be parted from his stable-mate Nobby, the third and longest-serving sheep to have kept the horse company. Nobby travelled everywhere with the horse during his racing career and they are now enjoying retirement together in Oxfordshire. Horses form strange relationships because of loneliness. To avoid the costly accidents that can happen when horses play together, racehorses must be kept apart. Many spend much of their day in a

The animal watcher Desmond Morris compares this incarceration to prisoners being kept in solitary confinement. "It can make humans go mad eventually," he suys. "Horses are gregarious animals but they are also very amenable. Most will put up with being alone. But when we say racehorses are highly strung, what we mean is that they can't cope with

PET-FRIENDLY ACCOMMODATION

Chippy the goat protects his geese friends Samson and Delilah from dogs

Gomez, a cat at Ruxbury Farm, has formed a bond there with a horse called Jupiter. Dr Mugford says: "They play together and the cat lets the horse chase him around the field, but Jupiter is careful not to hurt Gomez."

But he warms that such relationships do not always work. "You are more likely to have trouble hetween different species than with animals of the same kind. This can be apparent where one animal is a carnivore, such as a dog, and another is what might be considered its traditional lion's blown it for me. I had always rather thought that I threw the best parties, but now I have to concede that I don't. Last Sunday. he hosted the raviest, grooviest, most fantabuloso birthday bash of all time. and — to my great pleasure and not a little amazement — we were there. Obviously most of us don't have a spare £150,000 to blow on a knees-up for our mates but, equally, his party managed to hit all the right spots in a way that I'm pretty sure similar extravaganzas by Malcolm Forbes or Robert Maxwell wouldn't have. I've never seen so many people look so happy dancing for so long under one roof, and not an illegal substance in sight. This was particularly striking because for some years now, I am sad to report as the Life and Soul (of the party) columnist. most of my friends have given up dancing. When we first knew each other, in the long hedonistic years before children and careers had whittled away our leisure time, and when nothing in life seemed more important than friendship and having fun, we used to go clubbing all the time. No one needed any encouragement then to get up and shake their bootie. But now everyone seems to be too exhausted to boogie, let alone The problem is that when the occasion is rather low-key, as it so often is these days, there is nothing to rise to. It seems that we can only abandon ourselves to the party spirit when we have been compelled to make an effort to dress up. As I have known, to my cost, a successful party on even a fairly modest scale requires military planning and execution. The organisation of Elton's party (with a rather immodest guest list of 800) was faultless. And talk about making an effort to dress up . . . Having rejected the Liz Taylor pre-rehab kaftan and the Divine meets Ursula Andress in wafty full-length toga look, my husband one was in disguise - celebrities and non-celebrities alike contributed to the party's success. It had a strangely levelling effect, since the famous were quite often outshone in the costume departmen by the unfamous. At one point, I found myself bopping in a spectacularly starry cluster: Lord Lloyd Webber, looking like a 12-year-old in long socks, shorts and football strip (Fever Pitch, the musical?) with Lady Lloyd

I tossed my curly wig and slipped into my Pan's People routine, to be joined by a Leigh Bowery-lookalike in day-glo pink platforms. Later, during Dancing Queen, we joined a hefty couple in matching home-made, homage-to-Mary-Quant mini-dresses to dance around our handbags — as you do — theirs from the 1960s, mine from the

I used to think that the only way to get a party moving was to invite huge numbers of gay men — a tactic clearly shared by Elton. But after organising my mother's 70th several years ago, I realised that there was one other group dedicated to dancing the night away. I now know that what you need for your party to go with a swing is as many active erected a marquee in our back garden with a trestle table, seating 70, smothered in white flowers. Our living room was stripped bare and the carpet covered with a wooden dance floor, in the corner of which was a jukebox which contained a cunning mixture of Glenn Miller (for the oldies) and Tamla Morown (for the notso-oldies). Before the waiters had even cleared away the plates. Mum's friends

- the men resplendent in black tie, the women (inevitably the majority) visions in full-length chiffon and satin and silk stampeded the dance floor and shimmled and swayed and twisted as though the chance to dance might never come again.

It was three in the morning when my mother sat down and requested a cup of coffee. I shall never forget the look of delighted surprise in her eyes as she twirled indefatigably around our living room. She was certainly In the mood that night - which was probably what made it such a swell party for me. I'd like to say, Elton eat your heart out. But after Sunday, I can quite see that I can't.

Some children taught by a parent never recover from the collision of public and private worlds which may also alienate them from classmates

It's parents' day all year

When mother or father is also

li parents possess the ability to embarrass us, particularly in front of our friends. But can anything be worse than having your mother or father teaching at your school? It happened to Tony Muir 30 years ago and he still claims not to have recovered from that awful collision of public and private worlds.

For as long as Tony could remember, his father had been a kindly but vague figure who went out on his bike in the morning and turned up in the evening. Then when Tony was 12 Mr Muir was appointed deputy head at his son's grammar school and the next thing Tony can remember is this angry man chasing his classmates down the corridor.

Worst of all, as the miscreants were dragged away. Tony had to stand there and feel their long accusatory glances. Although it had been their misbehaviour that occasioned the new deputy's wrath, Tony felt he was being branded a quisling. People who have been taught by their parents often congregate at parties swapping stories of alienation and persecution.

Rosie Lewis, however, feels she survived the experience better than most. Rosie and her sister Joanna spent their entire school life in a world where mum was also the English teacher. It didn't seem at all odd therefore that every morning, at some stage between getting into the car and arriving at school, the girls' mother would be transformed into that well-known classroom disciplinarian. Mrs Purnell. "Thinking about it. it does seem funny," says Rosie, 34: "When I take my children to school in the morning we kiss and cuddle at the gate before I say goodbye but there was never any of that with Mum. I never knew anything different, of course, so it didn't bother me, but looking back it does seem strange."

Joanna, 36, can recall how easy it was to disconnect from the family relationship once school began, "If I'd see Mum coming down the corridor at school, I'd just think 'it's one of the teachers'. We never exchanged glances or talked about what we'd be having for tea. That was just how it was." Tony Muir is less philosophical. Now in his forties he still wishes his father had never come to teach at the local grammar school, "It wasn't just the feur of reprisals although there were some of those - this was a time when I vould have liked to get to know my father better but, if anything. I felt more distant from him. We were both of us very keen not to embarrass the other and I think that made for a real distance between us. In my twenties I wanted to ask him why he took the job Surely he must have known the difficulties it would cause? But I never did."

each other Tony also felt he was picked on by some of the teaching staff, "I'd overhear my parents talking about this one and that one my father was having trouble with and I'm sure some of those masters took it out on me. Not directly but there was this level of aggression. My parents always tried not to speak about school business in front

What Rosie feared most was her mother getting to hear about anything she did wrong. "I was a real scaredy-cat at school but I don't think any of the teachers did tell on me."

Mrs Purnell, now retired from teaching, shakes her head. "I don't remember anyone ever talking to me about the girls all the time I was there. I was in the staff room as a teacher. not as a parent."

The classic difficulty that arises from having a foot in both camps is that you never feel quite at home in either. Rosie was stung once when she gained a prize at the school eisteddiod and was told by another girl that she'd only won because her mother was the English teacher. "But if Mum ever marked our homework," says Joanna. "It came back a mass of red ink."

hirty years later Tony Muir still feels that he was caught up in battles between the staff and their reforming new deputy. "I was aware that it was important to do well. My father tried not to push me but I knew that it would be a disgrace if I did badly."

Although the Purnell girls and Tony Muir came out of the experience very differently, all three clearly felt a very real concern for their parents. Joanna can recall her friends impersonating the teachers. "Mum used to raise one eyebrow if she was cross. I used to dread seeing anyone raising an eyebrow like that." What I really hated was being in a classroom next to her," says Rosie. "I didn't want to hear her telling anyone off."

With the deputy head for a father Tony Muir was even more vulnerable. "I used to see him up on the stage in assembly. It was his job to tell the various forms when to leave and I had this dread that one day no one would do what he'd say, that there'd be a revolt and he'd be powerless. It's awful to fear something like that about your father." This concern for our parents is something we are used to feeling at home but at school the world normally divides more simply into "them" and "us" - adults vs children. The problem of having a parent teaching alongside you is that loyalties are divided

Tony Muir says: "My father died three years ago and I never asked him why he took that job. We never talked about what either of us went through, it was probably just as bad for him but we never spoke of it. I wish we had been the third Christian millennium begins. Greenwich purish church was the only possible place to visit. With pre-millennial tension building up around the world. I anticipated a levered excitement among Anglicans worshipping at the universal centre of time. But if ever a sense of the eternal, unchanging, omnipresent nature of the Church of England, or perhaps of God, is to be had, it is here.

Even though a millennium clock nearby had already started to tick the seconds away. it felt as if time was standing still. The church, like the hymn book it uses, combines ancient and modern. It has its own Web site. but uses a traditional liturgy peppered with thee and thy for communion. A committee has been appointed to plan millennium celebrations. Ideas under discussion including commissioning a dance for St Alfege, a carol from Cliff Richard, a son et lumière and re-enacting the journey of the Magi across Greenwich park at Christmas 1999. Yet Sunday worship in this beautiful church is reassuringly Anglican and traditional.

The vicar, who is also chaplain to the Royal Naval college nearby, was on holiday and our service was taken by the curate, Canon Richard Buck, whose natural ebullience belied his 60 years. The congregation was dotted with angelic children who were among the best-behaved I've seen in church.

There has been a church here at least since the time of the martyrdom of St Alfege, the 29th Archbishop of Canterbury and the man who introduced the precept of eating fish on Friday. He was taken hostage by the invading Danes on Easter Saturday and despatched with an axe on the site where the church now stands. Tomorrow the church will be closed during the Marathon, but next week worshippers can return to celebrate the feast day of their saint.

The composer Thomas Tallis was buried in the chancel of the church preceding this one and he is believed to have used an organ console preserved in the present church. Many members of the choir sing in the Tallis Society, which explained their breathtaking rendition of the anthem, And I Saw a New Heaven by Bainton. God's salvation would be revealed at the end of time, we heard, in our reading from the first letter of Peter. "In this we rejoice, though now for a little while we may have to suffer various trials." Canon Buck preached about the self-inflicted trials of the Heaven's Gate suicide cult. "They

"A man sought his advice on founding a religion which would be scientific, ethical and free from the superstitions of Christianity," he said. Talleyrand thought deeply and then replied: "I advise you to die and on the third day to rise again.

Borneo is changing, but the jungle still calls, says

ightning flashes through the dark Borneo jungle, flying foxes squabble in the treetops, fireflies flit. And, from somewhere in the dusk, a strange bird call trills out. It is high-pitched, regular, insistent in its command. "A hornbill?" I ask Patrick, our guide. "Our mobile phone," he says. And answers it.

There's a familiarity about this. On a previous trip to Borneo, still the most mysteriously remote of islands, we took an express boat up river. In the cabin, old men in loin cloths with earlobes dangling down their cheeks sat next to headhunters' grandchildren. The cabin lights went down and the entertainment started ... two hours of World Wrestling Federation videos. That night the sun set in scarlet fury and from across the river drifted music of primeval resonance: Herman's Hermits singing Something Tells Me I'm into Something Good.

isation, but Sabah is safer than most. In the top righthand corner of Borneo, it's the least familiar, the most eastern part of eastern Malaysia.

Patrick - half Filipino, quarter Bornean and quarter Irish — is leading our jungle trek. He has big plans for us: five miles through rainforest, hacking a way: wading across rivers, hanging on to rope bridges. Adventure, he says. Our party set off the following morning by Land Rover for the Tabin Wildlife Reserve. the largest protected area in Sabah, well off the tourist trail. Its jungles support mammals Squirrel, the Hairy-nosed Otter, the White Nocturnal Moonrat and the Lesser False Vampire Bat. We see none of them, but they probably see us as we stride past towering trees with great, buttressed trunks, twined and twisted with creepers. Everything here clings desperately to the slivers of light. There are six of us, including porters. Sharim carries the food, Dodong has the pots and pans and Mukamil brings up the rear, with the chemical toilet (and screens). From time to time Patrick calls out the names of the birds perching or soaring 200ft above us - the blue-throated bee-eater, the Asian paradise flycatcher, the Malayan blue hanging parakeet. He whistles to them. They whistle back.

We set up camp near a mud volcano: a clearing in the forest where animals gather to bathe. Patrick stares at a pile of dung. "Elephants were here yesterday." he says.

A village woman of the jungle, her ear lobes pierced, stretched and hung with weighty jewellery, is the traditional face of old Borneo. Elsewhere, high-rise hotels and shopping malls reflect the Malaysian boomtime

Sharim starts cooking dinner on a Primus stove, and insects are lured by the light. A flying grasshopper as big as a sparrow lands on my shoul-der. No problem, Patrick says. Not dangerous. "But that is. . . " He bangs his plate down on a beetle inching towards the omelette. "It flies in your ear and can't get out," he says. "There are many insects." says

Mukattil thoughtfully. As darkness falls, the croaking tree frogs take over from the "six o'clock cicadas". Bigwinged butterflies float past like tissue paper. The sun sets a lurid yellow, the flying squirrels circle as we sit under a vast dome of stars. The darkness is infinite, the jungle screeches and shooting stars flash across the sky. Both calming and alarming, it is very near paradise.

The next day is full of hombills, flapping and cackling in derision. It's hot enough to shower in your own sweat but later, in the evening cool, we climb on the Land Rover for a night safari.

Patrick scans the trees and roadsides with a searchlight, and suddenly a pair of animal eyes glints back. A leopard cat. a civet, a couple of owls? Buffy fish owls." Patrick says. It's the exhilaration of a hunt without the cruelty.

"Do you hear that clicking?" Bingo, our new guide asks. "It's clams closing.

On the sail back to Sandakan, we pass convoys of boats piled high with timber and controversy. Malaysia's log-ging policy may alarm environmentalists, but the nation's Prime Minister, Dr Mahathir Mohammad, is thrusting in self-defence. European nations have destroyed much of their forests, he says in The Borneo Post, Look at Sherwood Forest - cut down and replaced by castles. "Now it is our turn to develop. But they are not happy with it. They would like us to maintain our culture and to live in the jungle with no schooling. To them, there isn't much difference between us

AROUND THE WORLD: A WEEKEND GUIDE

TRAVEL NEWS

■ DESPITE increasing awareness of the dangers of sunburn, one in six Britons still overdoses on sunshine on holiday, a new survey says.

Nearly half of those who suffered used creams that were too weak. A higher number said they did not realise how strong the sun was. About 28 per cent got burnt after falling asleep in the sun. Burns were so bad that one in ten sufferers had to go to a doctor or hospital, says the insurance company Home & Overseas.

The older generation are the most sensible, with two-thirds of over-55s saying they never got sunburnt, compared with one-third aged below 35.

MORE GERMANS travel to more countries than any other nation. Their wanderlust means that almost 80 million - one in eight - of the world's tourists come from Germany. The Czechs are the second most travelled people with 57,3 million on the move last year. Americans are in third place and Britons fourth, according to a survey by analyst Euromonitor.

France is the most popular country and attracts 60.5 million foreign visitors a year, with Spain second, America third, Italy fourth, China fifth and Britain sixth.

The biggest growth in both arrivals and departures has been in eastern Europe, with Poland recording a 70 per cent increase since 1991.

MRESTAURANTS in some of the most popular resorts in Cyprus, such as Ayia Napa and Protaras, will shut next week because of a strike by staff in protest at a Government ban on issuing work permits to foreigners.

SINGAPORE just pipped Manchester to be voted the world's top airport by longhaul airline passengers, says the International Air Transport Association. The new terminal at Changi ousted Manchester from the top spot it held last year in a poll of 55,000 passengers.

A NEW agency letting cottages has opened in Northern Ireland, with more than 100 properties on its books. Country Cottages (01232 815858) offers converted coach houses, farmhouses, fishing lodges and stone cottages, all of which are tourist-board graded. Peak season prices rise to £400 a week.

Night life with Elvis

FORGET THE likes of the Hard Rock Café and Planet Hollywood; a nightclub bearing the Elvis name is to open in Memphis this summer as part of the biggest ever Elvis Week (August 9-17), commemorating the 20th anniversary of the king forck'n roll's death. Expected to be the force of a normal death of a supplementation of the king of the large state and the secondary is situated in the force of the secondary in the force of the secondary is situated in the force of the secondary in the secondary is situated in the force of the secondary in the secondary in the secondary in the secondary is situated in the force of the secondary in worldwide chain, the large club complex is situated in the former Lansky's department store where the young Elvis bought his drainpipes and loafers in the 1950s.

Other highlights of the wake will include a candlelit vigil on August 15, the night of his death, talk-ins between family, friends and fans, and the opening of his parents' bedroom at his Gracelands mansion. A favourite Elvis snack - fried peanut butter and banana sandwiches - will be on sale throughout at the café next to his recording studio.

Postcards from the edge

THE 24-hour delivery of a postcard from Perth, Australia to a pensioner in Devon may be a record; personal experience reveals that Europe has a more cavalier attitude towards holiday mail.

Having recorded the dates of a year's cards sent and received, Hong Kong's service comes out top with an average of two to three days for delivery, and even my messages from Zanzibar took only six days; wish you were heres from Salzburg took four days, Dordogne five days, Greece a week, and even within Britain three to four days was par for the course.

The worst culprits: out of five postcards sent from Otranto in Italy, three were never seen again and the other two took three weeks to arrive. Two pre-stamped cards handed in to a Nairobi hotel did not arrive at all, although a card posted in Madrid at Christmas did — on February 20.

Bastille biking

CYCLING for Soft-ies (0161-248 8282) suggests La Venise Verte as the ideal spot to join France's Bastille Day festivities. In many of its villages you get a double dose of revolutionary celebrations, with fireworks, live music and dancing under the stars starting on July 13, followed by picnics and parades on July 14.

The Venise Verte in the Marais

Poitevin is one of the lesser known regions of France, It is criss-crossed by little lanes and a web of 12th-century canals hidden under tunnels of beech and poplar, and is a flat but picturesque landscape that is ideal for cycling novices.

The firm's seven-night "Super Softie" break, based on the village of Celles sur Belle, costs £563 for half-board accommodation, cycle hire and route maps, but not travel to and from France.

> TRADITIONAL winter mushine destinations are being offered at reduced prices in what is their low season from April until the end of June. In Kuoni's (01306 740500) Limited Edition programme, a week's B&B in Luxor costs between £259 and £319; six nights in Cuba's Havana costs £299-£345 or in a Varadero beach resort from £355 £379, both on a room-only basis. There are also savings on holidays to Mexico (from £499). the Maldives (from £529) and Grand Cayman (from £579).

Late bookings

WITH tour operators already putting "full up" signs at many popular summer destinations. I checked out a few last resorts from the largest tour operator. Thomson Holidays (0990 502555). Claiming a 20 per cent rise in bookings overall for summer 1997 - fastest sellers being the Balearic islands, Canaries, southern Spain and, after a few years' gap, Italy it can still offer space on the sand in the Greek islands: a June week on Kos, the birthplace of Hippocrates, costs £300 B&B. In Spain's Almeria, an August half-board week costs around £380. In Croatia, a week's half-board costs E400-E440 in either picturesque Rovinj or the old Austro-Hungarian aristocratic holiday favourite of Opatija.

Further afield, the Dominican Republic is a longhaul bestseller that is already 70 per cent full, and you may have better luck with Mexico, Jamaica or by flying to Florida from a regional British airport. A formight's package to Orlando in early July, departing from Cardiff, costs £565 (based on four sharing on a room-only basis).

THE International Otter Survival Fund (01471 822487) is running five-day ofter watching trips to the Hebridean islands of Skye and Raasay between May and October. On the west coast of Scotland otters are not nocturnal, and with patience and luck it is possible to watch them fishing and playing in the lochs. The price of E325 includes full board and daily excursions with a professional guide.

Historic homes

WELL-KNOWN for its British collection of forts and follies, the Landmark Trust, the charity that rescues historic buildings and lets them out for holiday rent, also has foreign properties. In Italy, these include 26 Piazzi di

Spagna, the apartment sleeping our in Keats's former house in Rome — he died on the floor below in 1821 — which costs £1,134 a week (per property); and Villa Saraceno. the l6th-century Palladian villa in Vicenza that exemplifies all the characteristics that English architects learnt from the master him-self, Andrea Palladio. The villa costs from £3,283 a week and can accommodate 16 people.

Naulakha, Rudyard Kipling's former New England home in Vermont, was built in 1893 when he was still entranced by the countryside of his new wife's family, although homesickness drove him back to Britain. Eight people can rent the home for £890-£1,328 a week.

The Landmark Handbook costs £8.50, refundable against booking from the Trust (01628 825925).

No trip to Scotland is complete without a visit to a distillery and some serious sampling. Details of the 42 distilleries that welcome visitors including those with facilities for disabled people, are available from the Scotch Whisky Association (0171-629 4384). An interesting phrase recurs in 22 of the 42 listings: "Admission charges with redemption in shop". What can they mean?

Poorly trained and over-equipped novices on diving holidays are destroying rare marine life

The ever-growing popu-larity of recreational diving is good for busi-- but not for the coral reefs and their inhabitants. With bigger, more fuel-efficient aircraft, cheaper tickets and dive centres booming everywhere, divers travel ever more frequently, in larger numbers, further and further away to the last unspoilt places in the world. As if that is not enough, there are new big boats almost everywhere to take divers to the most remote and inaccessible virgin reefs. A few are ecologically aware; most, unfortunately, are not.

They arrive in the mid-Pacific or the central Red Sea with perhaps fewer than 15 dives logged and the printer's ink still wet on their certification cards, armed with video systems and cameras that make Jacques Cousteau's equipment look like toys. With no knowledge of marine life or buoyancy control, they damage and destroy the reefs and bit by bit, day by day, they eventually frighten the marine

In Egypt, on the Sinai peninsula, the booming diving trade has got so busy that dive sites have to be policed and prior booking has to be made with the local authorities to go to a selected dive site. And if one wishes to see sharks -- it's too late. They have all swum away to quieter areas. I visited Sudan last year and was deeply saddened by the amount of damage being done to some frequently dived reefs

Sha'ab Rumi and Sanganeb reefs are among the richest in the Red Sea and, according to popular belief, they are little thown and rarely dived. This is far from the truth. At the time of my visit there were possibly up to ten live-aboard boats operating out of Port Sudan - not bad for a country that is still in a state of civil

Most of the divers seemed to be Italian and many were apparently experiencing their first tropical dives. Corals were being hung on to and dislodged in the strong currents. Tragile staghorn and fire corals were being broken into pieces by careless fin kicks or being landed on as a result of poor buoyancy control.

A diver was seen to sit on a large brain coral to pose for the camera. Photographers regularly sit, lie or kneel on corals while taking photographs. In one case I observed a pair of divers remove large chunks of the reef to get a closer view of a moray eel hiding in a crevice, only to find the eel swim off in a panic. Much worse: at the Cousteau Precontinant II study area, on Sha'ab Rumi reef. many of the corals are dead. Some of the extremely large table corals that look so beautiful in Andre Ghisotti/Alessandro Carletti's book. Red Sea Diver's Guide, stand now as great, lifeless skeletons.

Tes. there still is a lot of coral there but it is soft coral, Lithophyton arhoreum. This is an aggressive grower that takes particularly well in areas where there is no competition, notably on dead corals.

In the Mediterranean there is also a problem, again with recreational divers. Although there are no coral reefs, there are many "ahermatypic" corals. These are solitary, nonreef building corals that grow mostly in shaded areas such as cave entrances or on rocky overhangs.

All along the rocky Mediterranean coastlines there are uncountable crevices, caverns, rocky overhangs and permanently shaded walls, areas that sustain a prolitic growth of delicate bryozoans (sea mosses), ahermatypic corals, fan worms, aneniones and

The Mediterranean, with its warm waters and relatively short flight times from most of Europe, attracts divers by the thousands each summer. Indeed, many may learn to dive here. But, once again, lack of knowledge and poor buoyancy control lead to no end of this fragile environment being damaged. Fin kicks and cylinders hitting the cave ceilings break away the sea mosses and corals on a daily basis. Areas frequently visited by divers result in large pockets of waste air accumulating under these overhangs. This air sometimes stays for hours or even days before filtering through the rock, also causing the death of many anemones. corais and sponges.

uring the past few years, much has been written on this subject and in some countries action is being taken to control diving activities, such as in Egypt. Many dive centres'try to make their divers more aware, but little or nothing is being done. It is time for all concerned, from certification agencies, diving schools, diving instructors and even travel organisations, to take a long and serious look at these problems. A complete revision in training programmes for divers is urgently needed Much more time should be spent on buoyancy control training, for example, and certainly a large part of any diver's course should include education to make everyone more aware of the marine life around them.

Exploring the Red Sea: Eqypt is controlling its dive sites

I want to see Pompeii – slowly

THE growing numbers of active senior citizens seeking bungee jumping or scuba diving holidays has seen tour operators catering extensively for demand in recent years. The sector is complemented by the backbone of coach tours and escorted groups available for holidaymakers of advancing years. However, Times reader Jean Lefley does not want any of these options. As a and at a pace where she can "relax and potter". She wanted to visit Pompeii but could not find a tour operator who offered the site without it being part of a demanding itinerary. "It is all right if there are two of you who can arrange a holiday tailored to your own requirements and pace. But for the solitary traveller, there is nothing single person, she wants to travel abroad designed for those who would like a less demanding schedule and a much more léisurely pace.

"I have had to take holidays abroad which are too busy and miss out some of the excursions, even though I have paid for them as 'included' in the considerable cost of the holiday." Miss Lefley, of Stammore, Middlesex, has developed an Italian passion late in life. She is aware of Page & Moy coach tours -- "which I would hate, sightseeing and constant moving from place to place"

- and Saga, "possibly all right for the newly retired in good health".

A slower paced Italian odyssey for the less energetic traveller may prove difficult to find. Explore Worldwide. which includes many "easy" holidays in a brochure of 170 different options, has an eight-day tour based on Naples and Sorrento which includes Pompeii.

The average escorted group is between 18 and 22 people with visits to a number of archaeological sites. But there is travelling every day on the itinerary. Travers Cox, the managing director, says: "Our tours are structured, the sightseeing is planned and there is not a lot of free time. She could opt out but it defeats the object.

"On longer trips we build in the odd day off, but on shorter, archaeological trips the itinerary is completely full. She is a bit in-between - perhaps she could look at other parts of the world with not so much movement built in." Sunvil Holidays also runs escorted tours and is mindful of the energy levels of many clients. Dudley der Parthog, the director, says: "A lot of tours are for the elderly market, so we are not going to let them come home exhausted." However, Sunvil's definition of relaxed is still unlikely to match that of Miss Lefley's. Its ten-night tour of Cyprus, for example, involves stays in five hotels.

A cruise is the choice of many energetically challenged holidaymakers, with Swan Hellenic and P&O Cruiscs among those combining on-board lectures with shore excursions. But a landbased holiday is more of a problem. John Kirk of VFB Holidays, which specialises in escorted groups to France, says: "With the best will in the world, we want to accommodate people. But if it is not suitable, or it will hold other people up, then we tend to say 'no'.

"I think Miss Lefley would be much better suited with a standard package holiday where she can pick up the daytrip options she requires.

🕇 hiantishire is chic. Chiantishire is charming. Chiantishire is middle England's idealised vision of abroad. Indeed Chianti is the countryside they are keen to copyright. Could it possibly be right, then, to go and camp right in the middle of it?

To one whose middle-class ambi-tions had often focused on a prolonged sojourn - perhaps refirement - in some dream Tuscan farmhouse, the proposal smacked of sacrilege.

If not quite stealing beauty (to smuggle in the name of a recent film in which Tuscany's photogenically rolling countryside commandeered the starring role), this was decidedly getting beauty on the cheap. I need not have worried. In the event the Girasole camping centre, up a side road from Figlione Valdarno, gave fulfilment to the more modest aspects of my dreams without spoiling anyone else's.

The site is large, but in its older section, established 20 years ago, already blanketed in trees. Even the more recently installed, and still rather raw looking, gravel terraces on which our Eurocamp mobile homes were stationed didn't block

The single picturesque Tuscan villa on the pine-clad shoulder of hillside overlooking the camp was the Villa Norcenni, owned by the campsite proprietors and let by them as holiday apartments to tourists who would not go without the security of four walls.

Mobile homes have walls, but they are thin ones. Only Japanese The caravan site for sore eyes paper ones come thinner. Many mobile homes are, of course, anything but mobile. Eurocamp's stay where they are put, complete with shower and toilet, gas cooker, fridge, and sitting room, atop a redundant undercarriage, like neatly arranged chalets on wheels. Pull-out beds and bunks make a sleeping capacity, it is claimed, of eight, but that is horrible to contemplate. Two of us with one small bedroom apiece were perfectly comfortable. Three, or even four who knew each other well and got along reliably, would have been tolerable. After that, I imagine,

entering after 10.30pm (some summer Germans and, sadly, Brits having sometimes abused a comeand-go-as-you-please regime). So our hotch-potch of tents, vans, pavilions, Portakabins and trailers in the Tuscany sunshine resembled a well-ordered suburb, with two restaurants, a post office, a supermarket, souvenir shops, a public haths, tennis courts, football pitthes, bowling greens, riding stables and swimming pools. There were no untoward disturbances, unless natured bunch of young Italians from Figlione who chose the camp's excellent Taverna as the venue for a send-off to one of their number who had been called up for military

The site's restaurants were good enough to attract regular local custom. The chefs, Paolo Arnetoli and Marinella Raspini, gave cookery classes by special arrangement on two mornings during our stay. Young British mums who discovered the secrets of making crostini and tiramisu reckoned they were good enough to be on television. The rest of the camp's crew, though, were a cosmopolitan crowd. The statuesque beauty behind the bar who looked as if she had just stepped out of a Chirlandaio fresco was a Dane. The Claudia Cardinale lookalike behind the supermarket till was Irish. The barman who made perfect cappuccino was Spanish and the comely waitress was Australian.

Some of the camp rules were strange, none more so than a requirement that anyone using the swimming pool must wear a bathing cap. This applied, I was told, even to men, like me, who were completely bald. The most plausible justification advanced for the rule was that hair clogged the pool's filters, but no one suggested my beard needed wrapping.

By contrast, too, no headgear was available for two other camp pastimes where it might have been thought essential horse-riding and scooter hire.
 The Irish Claudia Cardinale confided that her cousin had fallen off one of the scooters - and the doctors at the local hospital had not noticed that she had cracked a knee, a rib and a wrist, overlooking all three while strapping a supposedly strained tendon.

Undaunted by these omens 1 hired a scooter. The mileometer, speedometer, trafficators and horn did not work, but otherwise it was fine, and as long as one travelled on byroads, proved an invaluable way of getting about the countryside.

Greve in Chiann, with a wide open triangular market place, local hero's statue and traditional macellaria selling excellent salami and prosciutto proved the prize exhibit, but the roads between Radda and Strada were delightful.

I would not have dared ride the scooter into Florence or Siena.

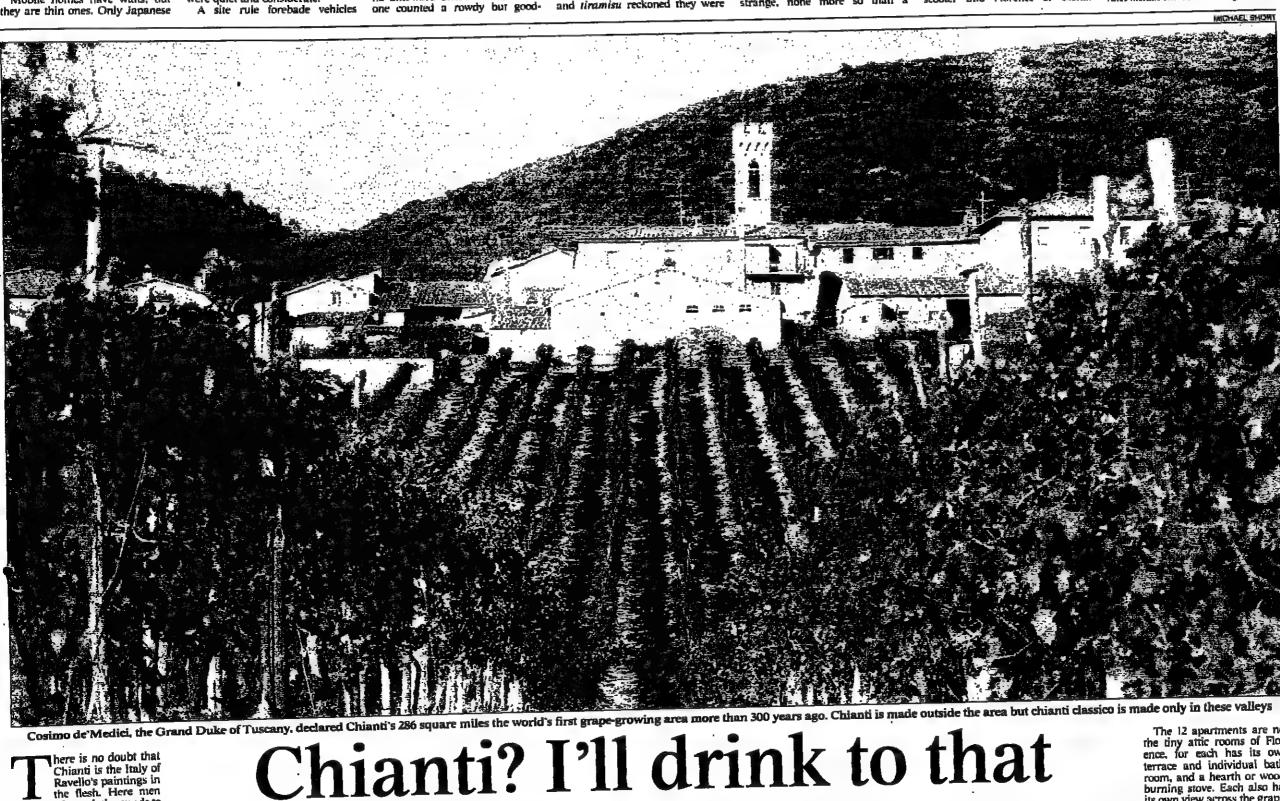

though others did, but the camp was linked to the former by bus or by rail from Figlione. One English couple were using the camp as a base for their detailed exploration of Florence, having decided that it was both more economical and congenial than staying in town.

Tuscany is so rich in treasures that it becomes impossible to nominate favourites, but after the crowds in San Gimignano no one should miss Monteriggione, the perfect little fortified hilltop town that has scarcely altered since Dante described it in his Inferno. We had commendable meals at Al Marsili in Siena and Da Giannino in Florence. I found myself a well above average lunch at the Vignale in Radda, and we had an excellent dinner with fine wines at the Locanda Borgo Antico at Lucolena, on the way to Greve. Yet the outstanding meal was, appropriately, our last supper, at the Hotel Ristorante Santa Chiara, a restored loth-century convent in Sarteano.

What we had saved on accommodation also enabled us to buy enough pasta, truffle cream, sulami, panforte and olive oil to last till next spring, when, who knows, we might go camping around Chiann

There is no doubt that Chianti is the Italy of Ravello's paintings in the flesh. "There are thousands of miles of them wandering across the face of rural Italy. When such a road has reached your door, it has no necessary further existence; it may struggle along somewhere else, or it may not." The vicinali provide the key to the secret Italy, the Tuscany beyond the Uffizi - in Chianti. In Chianti, these winding, often unpaved roads, cart tracks that have etched their way into the heart of the landscape, are called the strade bianche, the white roads. They curl as secretly and as sinuously as the tendrils of the vines they pass. Theirs is a world where there is scarcely a telephone pole or electricity cable, let alone a road sign; a world where the Tarmac would return for a time, only to disappear again without explanation. But there was always another vista, and always one I had not been expecting.

On occasion, the dark

Sangiovese grapes that make 00 per cent of the wine of Chianti would wrap themselves around me like an aristocrat's cloak. But then, just as suddenly, they would disappear, to be replaced by a stunning panorama, such as the one across to the lothcentury abbey at Badia a Passignano, just west of Greve, which shimmered like a Moorish palace in the morning mist. One morning I took the winding Via Chiantigiana north out of Panzano up to almost 1.600 feet, then doubled south again towards the castle of Volpaia, which produces one of the finest chianti classicos. You can buy it from a small shop set into the castle walls on one side of a village square that is scarcely large enough to house half a dozen tables for its one café. I sat there for an hour and watched the inhabitants come and go. October is the time of the vendemmia, the grape harvest, and the locals come to the cafe to buy bread and talk about the weather. They know the grapes must be picked when they are dry, and juiced quickly if the chianti is to be good. The grapes, and the wine that comes from them, are the staples of Chianti, as are the olives from the trees for their oil.

The producers make the chianti beyond the borders of these narrow, magical valleys at the centre of Tuscany, but not far outside them, and the finest version - chianti classico itself - comes from these valleys alone.

The wine consortium of the region is so proud of its history and its wine that it marks it with the gallo nero. the black rooster. This is the ancient emblem of the 14th-century Chianti Military League, which had its headquarters in Castellina in Chianti. Two centuries later, Giorgio Vasari included the rooster in his ceiling painting of the Salone dei Cinquecento in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence. If you stay in Castellina in Chianti, with its tiny chapel to St Francis of Assisi in its main street, it is less than an hour's drive to Florence. That way, you can sneak up on the city. arriving at 5.30 on an autumn afternoon after a late lunch at an osteria on the white roads. and slip into the Uffizi without having to queue.

Then, in the gathering dusk, you can take the autostrada south for a while, before turning east into the Chianti hills again and winding back through Machiavelli's homeland by way of Sambuca and San Donato in Poggio. The plain behind you stretches away westwards towards the setting sun and the towers of San Gimignano fade to shadow on the horizon.

Or you can drive for 40 minutes from Castellina or Radda one morning and experience the splendour of the Piazza del Campo in Siena. before disappearing into one of that mysterious city's side streets for lunch, away from the worst of the crowds. You can be back in Chianti for a siesta by three o'clock, even if you do stop on the way for a grappa in Vagliagli. I toured the strade bianche from a tiny new development just four kilometres outside Castellina called Collelungo, which means "the long hill". Here, 12 individually modelled apartments, all with their own galley kitchens, have been painstakingly created over the past seven years by Tony Rocca, an English journalist. and his wife Mira.

Just a few minutes by car from Castellina, there have been dwellings on Colle-lungo's 200 acres of woodland. vineyard and olive grove since the Etruscans, but now the entire estate is being restored by the Roccas. The grapes and olives are to be harvested again, and the buildings have been carefully refurbished to retain their original features.

Hidden at the foot of its own two kilometre-long and suitably rutted strada bianca, it is one of Chianti's newest secrets and opened its doors for the first time in the spring of 1996.

The 12 apartments are not the tiny attic rooms of Florence, for each has its own terrace and individual bathroom, and a hearth or woodburning stove. Each also has its own view across the grapes towards the turrets of Castellina and provides an unsurpassable base for discovering Tuscany — and Chianti — in a style that those in pursuit of their own Room With a View over the Arno in Florence will never see.

There could be no liner place from which to prove that Chianti is not, and never has been, a bit of a joke.

Italy: The delights of sights old and new, from the laid-back cities and towns around the Bay of Naples.

Coast of song and the mount that roared unday night at San Carlo opera house is a highly social occasion for the Neapolitans. As the lights go down, torches snap on in the six tiers of red and gold boxes and throughout the early evening performance of Rigoletto are noisily borrowed, reclaimed and offered to the people behind in order to follow the libretto. When the wildly popular home-bred baritone Leo Nucci galloped through his third encore of Vendetta si Tremenda Vendetta, he had stepped out of the role of tragic father bent on revenge to one of grinning, bowing superstar. Drama swept aside and belief suspended, matrons in black wool suits and tight perms chanted "Verdi! Verdi!"

San Carlo, the pride of Naples since 1737, is famous for its acoustics but, purists be warned, the Neapolitans go to see the opera, not to hear it. Tickets are hard to get, but the rest of the city's great sights are accessible, uncrowded and spent many hours wandering the steep, narrow streets of the old quarter of Spaccanapoli, and the Spanish steps, once notorious for street urchins, without feeling the slightest bit threatened. Of course, you should take care of your valuables, but the greatest hazards I encountered were being dripped on by the festoons of laundry that block the sky, and near-collisions with fast-moving pedestrians talk-ing over their shoulders. Either the Vespa-riding bag-snatchers and pickpockets had given it up for Lent, or Naples has indeed become visitorfriendly once more.

An alternative to staying in noisy Naples is to base yourself in quaint, easy-going Sorrento, across the Bay of Naples. Despite being perched on the most beautiful stretch of coast in the Mediterranean, Sorrento it is not the place for a beach holiday. Best visited in spring and autumn when it is less hot and crowded, it makes a good centre for day trips.

Frequent trains on the Circumversuviana railway go to Naples in an hour. The same train takes you to Pompeii -always a busy site but less so during the midday-3pm lunch period - and Ercolano station for Herculaneum, preserved for posterity by a river of mud after the same eruption of Vesuvius in AD 79 that covered Pompeii in ash. Hydrofoils serve Capri, where visitors flock to the Villa San Michele, built by Dr Axel Munthe on the site of a Roman villa, which has Roman statues and a magnificent view.

Buses from the railway station go to Positano and Amalfi along the coast. In high summer Positano is popular with rich Italian holidaymakers. It was a postwar haven for artists and writers, most famously John Steinbeck. Now its steep, crooked streets are filled with shop doors covered in flapping beachwear, and daytrippers jostle for the limited space on which to sit, lie or stand. Yet seen from the coast road, or from a vessel on the azure sea, it is breathtakingly pretty with its higgledy-piggledy layers of pink, cream and yellow-washed houses clinging to the cliff. Zeffirelli and Sting have villas there. On ten miles to the less

In the main square is the bus stop for Ravello, and just when I thought the next hairpin bend would be my last, the bus deposited us nearly 1,000ft up the rock face at the edge of the delightful, traffic-free village that most tourists never see. There are two good reasons for going up there before lunch. One is the stomachchurning journey and the other is the Menu Degustetione at Palazzo della Marra. whose awful pink paintings are more than made up for by course upon course of delicious dishes adapted from old local recipes. For the less hearty there is a Menu Tipico. There are two wonderful gardens in Ravello in which to walk off your lunch. Return to base in Sorrento to recuperate from so much sightseeing. With a refreshing lack of architectural or archaeological wonders that must be seen, it is a wonderfully relaxing place to stay.

The cathedral, bell tower and museum are all there if you want them, but ambling about in the old quarter you can discover for yourself many little churches and old houses yellow-tiled cupola of the working men's club. With open arches on three sides, it provides a living tableau of cioth-capped elders playing cards under a frescoed ceiling. Passing in front of it. Via S. Cesare has many little shops selling handsome, long stemmed artichokes and tomatoes on the vine.

Days in the Hotel Vittoria Exceisior, built on the spot where Emperor Augustus had his holiday villa, make a delightful change from gadding about. Purpose-built in 1834 and still family-owned, it is centrally placed between the main square and the port, yet buffered from the hurly-burly by a citrus-tree-lined avenue. The hotel is grand but not stuffy. Its airy Art Deco reception rooms are comfortable and uncrowded.

... to the bustle of Florence, which enchants the eye - and empties the wallet

long weekend in Florence, where there is so much to see, means time is precious, so it is essential to book through an agent who knows enough to organise flights that do not arrive in the middle of the night.

This is not as simple as it may sound, because Florence airport falls well short of coping with tourist straffic, even in the off-season. An alternative is to fly to Pisa and then eatch the train to Florence that leaves every hour. This is what Kirker Holidays did for us with trouble-free travel vouchers that took us all the way to the five-star Hotel Helvetia e Bristol just off the Piazza della Repubblica.

A short, acclimatising stroll took us almost immediately to the Duomo. There was an inevitability about this. The domed cathedral, with its multicoloured but predominantly white marbled exterior, commands the city like no other building. It is not just the size that impresses: rather it is the realisation that this awesome creation of the medieval imagination is the starting point for a cultural awakening that was to put Florence at the heart of the Renaissance.

Not far away is the Bargello, once the city hall, later a prison, now a museum packed with Renaissance sculpture. Here is Donatello's bronze of David preparing to face up to Goliath, a recurring subject in Florentine art and one that inspired Michelangelo's supreme achievement. What is fascinating is the contrast between the two. Donatello's version, cast in the 1430s, shows a chit of a boy, almost camp in the way he stands; hand on waist, eyes lowered, his left leg slightly bent at the knee.

Seventy years on, Michelangelo's David, in the Galleria dell' Accademia, exudes power. This David, we are sure, will be more than a match for any giant. Now surrounded by a security screen, David shows the wounds caused by vandals and madmen including, incredibly, two carefully carved initials M and N on one thigh. But nothing can detract from this masterpiece, a justification in itself for visiting Florence.

A pause for contemplation (Michelangelo has that effect) leads to the nearest coffee bar. But it is at this point that culture and commerce can overlap to the detriment of spiritual comfort. The cafes that front on to the tourist tracks are hideously expensive. At the famous Gilli restaurant on the Piazza della Repubblica, a drink in the noonday sun can set you back a fiver at least.

ake time to wander the side streets where the little bars attract a predominantly Italian clientele. In any bar or restaurant, if the customers are all fellow tourists you can be sure the prices will have escalated accordingly. Random exploration also brings other rewards: the discovery of tree-lined squares and stone houses little altered after 400 years, and tucked-away churches with frescoes and sculptures that barely rate a mention in the guidebooks.

Our daughter's flat on Piazza della Santissima Annunziata faces a masterpiece of clean-lined classic design which turned out to be Spedale degli Innocenti, Europe's first orphanage. At one side of the portico is the rota, a rotating stone cylinder where mothers put unwanted babies. Whenever the stone turned, the orphanage had another mouth to feed. Above the arches are 15th-century terracotta discs of babies in swaddling bands. It is altogether an inspiring sight but one that needs

Another warning: before setting off to walk around Florence, be aware of the neurotic relationship between pedestrians and drivers on either four or two wheels. They all go at each other as if in an arena. The contest is made more exciting by the Florentines' addiction to portable telephones which tend to occupy pedestrians when they are halfway across the road. Loosely translated, a typical Florentine telephone conversation goes like this: "Hello. This is Andrea. I am standing in the middle of ... Aahhhhhh!" Whoever is being called can then use their own portable telephone to ring the hospi-

But what of Florence's great treasures, the target of every coachload of tourists? Patience. We will get to the Uffizi and Palazzo Pitti with their magnificent art collections - but not yet, because the sun is still high and even out of season that means long queues with nothing better to do than watch the pavement artists turn out bad sketches. Better to leave the big collections until later in the day when the crowds disperse. There is still much to see in the open air. The Piazza della Signoria with the Palazzo Vecchio and a square dotted with famous statues is a wanderer's delight, though when we were there extensive excavations were under way around the Loggia dei Lanzi and some of the sculptures had been sent off to the restorers' workshops.

For lunch we found, by chance, a restaurant for real Italians. Da Ganino, on the Piazza dei Cimatori, has marble-top tables with long benches which accommodate as many customers as can squeeze on. A sheet of brown paper serves as a table cloth. By way of an appetiser, a tasty wedge of mortadello was slapped down in front of us. accompanied by a glass of chianti. Remember, this is chianti country. You can have other wines but you pay a hefty premium. The starter was ribollita, a rich soup of cabbage, tomatoes, beans and olive oil. We followed with a traditional pasta that melted in the mouth.

Now is the time to hit the cultural high spots. The Uffizi seems to be the favourite, understandably, since this is where the Medici family, rulers of Florence for 300 years, housed the best part of their fabulous art collection. The Botticelli paintings are what everybody comes to see and even if, like me, you soon tire of flying cherubs delicately veiling their private parts, the colour and the draughtsmanship are a wonder to behold. I just wish I could rid myself of the idea that half the people here are chocolate box designers on a busintan's holiday.

The Uffizi is close by the River Arno and the Ponte Vecchio. You can see it is old, 1345 in fact, because it has shops overhanging its entire width.

They used to belong to tradespeople such as butchers and tanners who needed a handy waste disposer — the river suited them ideally — but now the bridge is populated by jewellers who never throw anything away even if, looking at some of the gaudy displays, they might well be advised to do so.

And so, weary footed, to the Palazzo Pitti, the Medici palace which looks less like a house than a fortress. But the treasures inside are a colourful and ornate contrast to the harsh exterior. The museums and galleries within the Palazzo Pitti have their own opening and closing times and charge separately. Be prepared. Ready cash is always handy in Florence and never more so than when the entrance turnstiles are ur leader ended his briefing with a po-faced aside: "For the benefit of any Americans present. I will be happy to repeat it at half-speed." Canadians dislike being patronised by their southern neighbours, and are happy to seize any opportunity to return fire. It is goodhumoured — almost.

Dressed in wetsuits and carrying crash helmets and paddles, we were about to undergo what for most of us was our first experience of white-water rafting. What had promised to be a jolly day out on the river was, after the recital of potential hazards, becoming an increasingly formidable prospect.

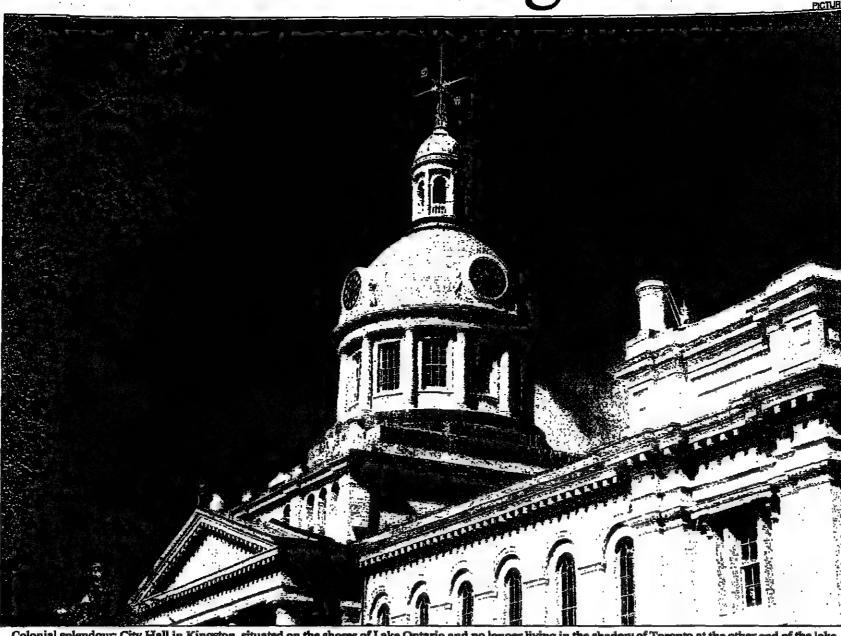

Any lingering comparison with a picnic on the Cherwell disappeared as we set forth on the mighty Ottawa River, which for about 400 miles forms the border between Ontario and Quebec before joining forces with the St Lawrence at Montreal. Broad and beautiful, it flows past granite cliffs and evergreen forests, its serenity periodically disturbed by cascades of rapids which provide thrills and spills for tourists and power for a series of hydroelectric generating stations.

As we approached our first rapid we were urged in parade-ground language to paddle harder and harder, the rait, a large, inflatable rubber dinghy accommodating up to 12 people, must maintain its momentum through the turbulence or the helsman loses control.

A wave of water enveloped us. Two members of our group, who had dis-regarded instructions to wedge their feet beneath the thwarts, were abruptly swept overboard. Rosie, my daughter, at 23 the youngest in the party, crowed and shrieked with delight.

Her glee was not, alas, shared by her father. Memories of struggling to right capsized sailing dinghies have left me with a strong aversion to sudden dunkings in cold water, wetsuit or no. We paddled ashore to sit on the rocks and get our breath back, while our guide offered any of us who wanted to quit the option of continuing on foot down the river bank which, he suggested, might prove even more uncomfortable.

For a few moments I toyed with the idea. But no. A man cannot appear chicken in front of his daughter. Besides, we now knew what to expect and, sure enough, each of the subsequent rapids, all given suitably alarming names, became progressively less terrifying. By the time we reached the last and biggest, we had become almost blase.

Safely ashore, we basked in the warm sunshine and a glow of achievement, watching the bucking and twisting of the rafts following astern. French and German tourists, we were told, often asked their guides to arrange deliberate capsizes just for the thrill of it. No wonder the British had a better navy.

Our tour of eastern Ontario had begun on an altogether quieter note in the little town of Merrickville, on the Rideau River, about 50 miles south of Ottawa. Although I had lived in Canada for several years, this region was new to me, a tranquil countryside of woods, dairy farms and slumbering villages.

Rideau Canal, was friendly and comfortable. The town takes its name from William Merrick, one of the brave and determined band of United Empire Loyalists who fled the American Revolution and settled in what was then Upper Canada (Quebec was known as Lower Canada). By the end of the 18th century he had established a thriving sawmill powered by the nearby waterfall. The canal was the result of the War of 1812. After rebuffing American attempts to "liberate" Canada, the British appointed Colonel John By to build a navigable waterway providing a safe passage between Montreal and Kingston on Lake Ontario. The settlement at the northern end of the canal, named Bytown in his honour, was later renamed Ottawa and designated by Queen Victoria as the new national capital, a compromise between

Thirty years ago Kingston was a rundown, unprepossessing sort of place, having long since been overtaken in economic importance by Toronto at the other end of the lake. But confidence was partly restored by hosting the yachting events at the 1976 Olympics, and the watefront has been restored to life with hotels, restaurants and marinas.

The immaculately preserved Fort Henry military barracks, high on a hill overlooking the lake, are a deservedly popular attraction. An authentic touch is provided by volunteer "extras" dressed in 18th-century British uniforms. Our guide, a handsome young university student, provoked palpitations among the female members of our party.

From Kingston, in the summer months. there are regular sightseeing cruises through the scenic Thousand islands oorder where Lake Ontario narrows into the St Lawrence. A little further downstream is Upper Canada Village, an enchanting recreation of a colonial settlement of the mid-19th century. Eschewing modern audiovisual aids and other interpretative gimmicks, it provides an object sson in how to bring the past to life. There are houses and shops, a farm, dairy and bakery, flour mill, sawmill and wool factory, printer, blacksmith and cabinet-maker, post office and tavern, church and chapel. The various buildings are staffed by a mixture of actors playing the parts of settlers, and skilled craftsmen and women dressed in period costumes but running their businesses on strictly f you have ever been to northern india or are considering a trip there, it is worth hurrying along first to the Queen's Gallery at Buck-ingham Palace. On show there, but only until April 27, is an Indian manuscript whose paintings have a wondrous beauty. It is on loan from the Queen's art collection.

The book has been unbound so that each of its 46 magnificent illustrations can be hung round the walls ready for curious eyes to pore over the richness and detail, from scenes of hunting to wedding processions, firework parties

After April 27, the manuscript will tour the United States and then return to the Royal Library at Windsor Castle to be rebound. It will probably never be exhibited in

It is called the Padshah-nama, meaning story of the emperor. And it is just that, recounting the most glorious episodes of the reign of the great Mogul emperor, Shah Jahan. It illustrates the best ones with some of the most detailed, colourful and glowing paintings to have come out of the imperial workshops. It may be the arabesques of a silk carpet, the Benares brocade of a courtier's coat or the simple observations of a farmer ploughing or a man hauling up water from a well.

The whole of Mogui India is here, precise in its tender portraits, in the transparency of fine Dhaka muslin and in the rich palette of hot oranges and reds, rich purples and greens, soft lilacs, yellows and aquamarines.

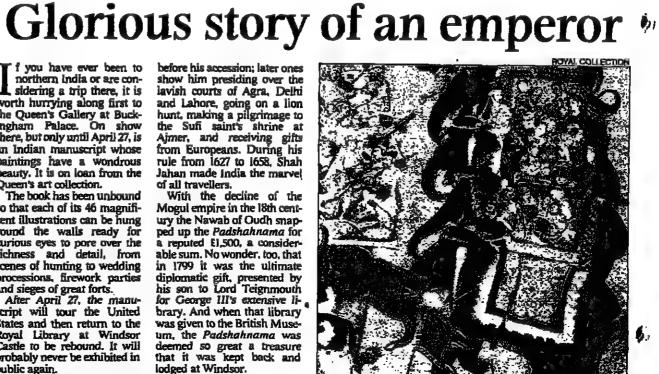

Shah Jahan, who built the Taj Mahal, was the fifth of the six great Mogul emperors who ruled most of the sub-continent in the 16th and 17th centuries. They lived hard: they were great soldiers, relentless campaigners, often hard drinkers, partial to opium, devout Muslims and, not least, tremendous art patrons.

Shah Jahan was all this. Several paintings celebrate his triumphs over Raiput rulers show him presiding over the lavish courts of Agra, Delhi and Lahore, going on a lion hunt, making a pilgrimage to the Sufi saint's shrine at Ajmer, and receiving gifts from Europeans. During his rule from 1627 to 1658, Shah Jahan made India the marve of all travellers. With the decline of the Mogul empire in the 18th century the Nawab of Oudh snapped up the Padshahnama for a reputed £1,500, a considerable sum. No wonder, too, that in 1799 it was the ultimate diplomatic gift, presented by his son to Lord Teignmouth for George III's extensive library. And when that library was given to the British Museum, the Padshahnama was deemed so great a treasure that it was kept back and lodged at Windsor.

Add a collection of sights on the way and it is, says the city's tourist office, a place where you can see more places of interest than in any other capital in the world.
"Wait a minute," I said to my guide, "Amsterdam isn't the capital, is it? It's The Hague." That's what I was told at school. The Government operates from The Hague. The Dutch Queen lives in The Hague, too. The law courts are there as well. Amsterdam is just. . . the capital. Which gives you some idea of why someone called it The Surprise Capital.

The one thing that is perhaps no surprise is that the authorities try to hide one of its best-known features. "People in Amsterdam," they say, "are not shy." Yet you will find no mention in the guidebooks of. well, let's go back to what the lady in the tourist office assures me they are not shy of. As she said: "They don't like curtains in their windows and so they don't mind people looking in. Even at night, when they have their lights on, you can take a peek at what is going on behind the glass, look into their rooms and they won't object."

What she really wanted me to do was to study the wooden furniture and the light fittings of which people are so proud. She would rather I had not mentioned the directions to the one window display that every hotel concierge has on his lips as though it were a prerecorded message, the one in which ladies can be seen sitting in various stages of undress. The authorities know that the sex industry brings in a huge amount of foreign capital (more British visitors than any other nationality).

There is street after street of it, and it is totally within the law, but the Dutch officials make a valiant effort to pretend that tourists come from the four corners of the world to study

The tourists also come, and miles of them in fields just a short ride away from the centre of the city. But, naturally, that can only be in season. I have just come back from a stay in which there were no tulips. There were no canal rides either - the waterways were frozen and, just a few weeks earlier, 10,000 people had skated on them in the biggest (and coldest) celebration of its kind in 25 years.

You need at least three days to fit in not just all the sights. but simply to get the flavour of the place, because Amsterdam is not like any other city I know, it has few tall buildings and few wide roads (although they do exist and there is the central Dam Square, from which both the royal palace and the red light district lead).

The inhabitants are friendly. Ask an elderly lady the way to the Van Gogh museum and she will take you there. As the guide said, they are not shy. Sit in a cafe and the man at the next table will advise you which strudel to choose. Seemingly, everyone speaks English - including the road sweeper who directed me to the restaurant I wanted.

n a way. Amsterdam is infuriatingly different. If you want that cup of coffee, look for a coffee house. A coffee shop is where you go (legally) to smoke cannabis. And the streets are where you try to avoid being run over by a bicycle. People seem to have a built-in radar to spot a silent Raleigh coming from east or west - or, if you cross one of the arched bridges over the canals, from north or south. There do not appear to be any laws of the road for a bike. A lot of them keep to the right and a lot to the left, and you have no way of knowing who is going to do what. By the canal side, what looks like the pavement is really a road. The pavements are about 18 inches wide and usually blocked by fallen railings, ladders, bicycles and winches used to haul those wardrobes into a top window. All this seemed to fit in perfectly with the clog shop over the road from the central station. There was a notice on the door - in English, of course: "Please be careful as you come in. There are live chickens walking around." There was also a live turkey. I suppose if I had wanted a pair of clogs. I would have had to find a shop selling chickens.

With or without clogs, you should walk. There are taxis dreadfully expensive — and there are some of the most comfortable trams I have ever known, but you "do" this city on foot. Ask the hotel doorman how to get to the Rijksmuseum and he will tell you it is a tenminute walk. Want to go to the railway station? That is ten minutes. To the flower market ia must, even out of season? Ten minutes "no more". To the Anne Frank House? "Down the road - about ten

I decided to spend the first full day taking ten-minute walks to the museums and tourist spots. The second day was reserved for a train trip out of town. The third was to "mop" up what I had missed so far. It worked well. I went to the Rijksmuseum first - a big railway station of a place (the station itself looks rather like a museum) that boasts one treasure that alone would make visiting Amsterdam worthwhile: Rembrandt's The Night Watch is a magnificent canvast wall. There are copies everywhere (hizarrely, including one in an adjoining room at this same muse um as well as other Rembrandts and works by Dutch masters) but this is all on its than one.

Rembrandthuis at the other end of town, where the artist did much of his work, is fascinating. It is furnished as it was in his day and his drawings early are on show. The only things missing are Rembrandt paintings. All the really good ones, except. The Night Watch, are in America or at the Hermitage in St Petersburg.

The city does well in recognising its artistic heritage, even though it does charge entry to all the museums (you can buy an Amsterdam pass, which will admit you to most and the Van Gogh museum just round the corner from the Rijksmuseum, there are more than 200 pictures including a version of Sunflowers. There are also numerous paintings from his "black pallet" period, worked on before he established his own style.

It was. I have to admit, a tram ride away from the museums to the Royal Palace, which the Dutch Queen uses only for ceremonial occasions and which is open to the public third day couldn't have offered a greater contrast. Even in midwinter, people queue to see the place where she and her family lived in hiding and where the diary was written. The house on the Princengracht has been renovated, but only to make it sale. The old wallpaper, with the pictures of film stars Anne stuck to the walls, remains but there is no furniture. It was all destroyed when the families living there were rounded up and the building's trustees wanted nothing that was not in place the day the Nazis knocked on the door.

the bookcase behind which they all hid, to examine the bare sink in the kitchen, where they cooked their meagre meals, and the single lavatory. There are pictures and a video display on the ground floor, showing the Frank family before they were taken off to the death camp.

The Franks, a Jewish family who had fled their native Germany when the Nazis moved in, were latecomers to Amsterdam but the community they joined was one of the oldest in Europe. went to the Amsterdam building after a refreshing walk from the Anne Frank House, stopping to peer into the smart boutiques of the Jordaan area — a cross between Hampstead and Chelsea - to have some of the best coffee (and strudel) I have ever tasted. An hour or so later I sampled a bag of delicious chips from one of the street

In the evenings I could have taken advantage of one of the enteries of which Amsterdam is particularly proud - those serving Indonesian cuisine but I chickened out and went Dutch instead.

Three nights in Amsterdam and three different meals, all of them in shabby bistro-like places without cloths on the tables. But if that is the way the people of Amsterdam like their restaurants, I am not going to argue.

meals were beautifully cooked and presented and served by courteous waiters. Was the Dover sole satisfactory? I said it was the best I had ever eaten. In the second restaurant, how about the vegetable soup? I said I was delighted they had left the tureen on the table. How was the omelette at the Sluizer? If I had had room to finish it. I might have been able to convey just a little of how magnificent it was. My hotel was equally enjoyable. The Pulitzer is a five-star establishment, put together from a series of old houses facing the canal. It has its own boat - when the water is not frozen — an elegant restaurant and a smaller place for coffee or lunch. Every room is different. "We have original paintings here," said the PR lady.

"Who knows, you could wake up and find you are sleeping with an old master." Which I thought made a change for visiting businessmen.

ou have been queueing outside the London Aduarium for a long time, distracting bored children with sightings of London buses on Westminster. Westminster Bridge and small boats pulling big boats on the river. Once inside, you go through the bag search and pay £20 for your family ticket.

Three floors — 170,000 square feet as the transatlantic voice on the Aquarium's taped phone message telis you --- await you.

The children are hungry and you could use a coffee. Do one floor and then have a break in the case? The case first? Neither. Once you're in the Global Case and Bar of "the capital's first and only world-class experience of underwater life", there's no going back. Exit only, herded through a narrow gift shop - and no re-admission.

Like some whale swallowing lots of little fish, the aquarium has a simple linear digestion system. In. through and out. No hanging around. And certainly no Jonahs.

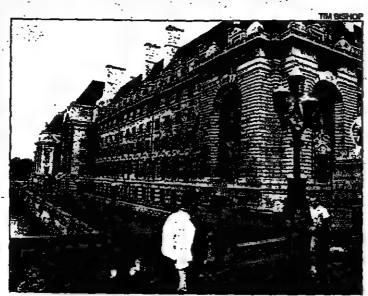

The aquarium was opened by the Japanese company Shirayama on Good Friday, in time for the school hols. We gave it a week to settle down. It wasn't enough.

There are some beautiful things on the ground floor, basement, and sub-basement of County Hall, once the home of the disbanded Greater London Council, but we left feeling we'd had rather a mean experience. It didn't start well. I'm sure that, in their way, rainbow trout are as fascinating as piranhas and giant squid, but the first part of our visit was a bit like a stroll along a supermarket chill cabinet. It's cavernous and very dark. Other aquaria seem to have a better grasp of using spotlights to keep fish and folk happy. You're always aware of being in a London basement. It seems little attempt has been made to re-create maritime scenes.

One of the two central pools, which you can see from different: levels, has two enormous and spectacular eastern-looking heads, apparently carved from rock. The setting was remarkable, but it deserved a better stock of marine life. We made the best of pointing out the few sharks to the children, but compared with shark displays they've seen in provincial towns, it was disappointing.

I suppose it was bad luck that the escalator wasn't appying (it stopped amid security calls for first-aid), but of handling the problem than herding visitors up the immobil-ised escalator with instructions to "keep to the left because there's a piece of metal sticking out of the top". Perhaps more than one escalator might not be a bad idea for the expected thousands of visitors a day this summmer.

Lots of the notices telling you which way to go, where the exit is, and exactly how to tickle a ray are just photocopied sheets. A rush job for the holidays, But far worse than that is the lack of really good information. Notices by the tanks are few, extremely brief, and far too high for all but the oldest children.

five-year-old daughter and threeyear-old son were fascinated by a fish with a long snout, but there was nothing to tell us what it was or anything about it. We watched some wrasse, and the five-year-old piped up: "Mummy, isn't that the one we've seen in the Sea Life Centre, that changes from being a man to a lady?" Very possibly, but there was nothing to tell us. The private lives of fish are very private indeed at the Landon Acuerium.

In a shallow-waters display, blennies swam among sea anemones, but there was nothing about the anemones at all. We were constantly lifting the children up to see above the crowds in front of each tank. There seemed to be large area. But there were two memorable tanks. The children laved the one filled with bright, fancy fish, and I stared for a while at the translucent and lovely moon

Our children have been entranced in various Sea Life Centres, They have stared for ages at the fish in the Tropical World in Roundhay Park in Leeds, which is free. A morning of scahorses, scary shark turnels, octopuses, cattish and crabs is just up their street. But the London Aquarium - for all its space - is poor value. There are said to be 350 species here, but it doesn't feel like it.

The children felt they'd had a long dark walk with less than exciting fishy interludes and couldn't wait to get out for an icecream. It took us more than five minutes to squeeze through the gift shop, not including the time spent buying two fish balloons (£1.99 each) at the exit.

Next we spent £10.40 on a river trip between Westminster Bridge and Tower Bridge and the children had a good time waving their fish balloons about.

Back home, they told their grandparents they'd been on a train, in a taxi, on a boat and in a bus. And they never mentioned the capital's first and only major experience of couple of sons to a football match requires a deep breath and a deep pocket, some fathers may be tempted to choose a museum instead. The Science Museum in South Kensington, London, where marketing now looms at least as large as scholarship, cannot be ac-cused of neglecting the opportunity. The museum has just opened an exhibition called the Science of Sport and, as Middlesbrough took on Leicester in the Coca-Cola Cup final last Sunday, the gallery was packed with would-be Ravanellis having a go. If some of their fathers were looking slightly shell-shocked. it may be because this moneysaving trip hadn't worked out quite as they had hoped. The Science of Sport isn't a museum gallery as you or I remember one. There's hardly an interesting object to be seen, old or new, save the beautiful Formula I McLaren-Mercedes driven, I think, by David Coulthard in last year's championship. Confirmation of this would have been a help. but last Sunday there wasn't a trace of information about the car, the driver, or how well it

The bulk of the gallery is taken up by try-it-yourself demonstrations of various sports. Remarkably, the youngsters formed orderly queues to do things you could do just as easily and with a lot more fun in a gym, or the back garden: kicking a football at a goal, throwing things about,

There is a rock wall to clamber across, with hand and foot holds and a soft landing to avoid injury, and a short section of running track where you can test your speed off the blocks. By far the most original display is virtual volleyball, where the ball is shown crossing a screen on which the participants can see themselves in silhouette as they jump for it. The feeblest is the

you simply balance on wob-bling snowboards. The science part of the exhibition includes a machine that analyses the nutritional value of a meal (sponsored by Shredded Wheat), a board with buttons and flashing lights to assess reaction times and rowing and pedalling machines with read-outs of speed and calories consumed. There is nothing on the aerodynamics of sport, though everybody would like to know how footballers "bend" a shot around the defensive wall, or golfers shape a hook around the trees. The principal sponsor is Adidas, so sports shoes get a cabinet to themselves. Even this is a missed opportunity. Behind the display is a mar-vellous picture of Les Ferdi-nand in full cry but the sports shoes are not those of actual sportsmen, with the exception of Stan Smith's tennis shoes. Real boots, worn by real players to score goals, would have made this look less like a shoe shop.

I didn't sample the simulators which demonstrate the thrill of bobsleighs, Grand Prix cars, motorbikes, or skis. They look good, but they cost an extra £2, on top of the £5.95 for adults to get into the museum (E3.20 for children) and the E3 (children E2) to get into Science of Sport. And, in case the point isn't made clearly enough, the only way out of the exhibition is through a shop selling sports gear.

The exhibition is open for the next 18 months, and the museum hopes to pull in an extra 300,000 visitors over that period. Hugh Roderick, its head of marketing and communications, says: "We want people to come away with a better understanding of the important role that science plays in sport. We also want to attract young people who previously haven't considered visiting the Science Museum, and convince them that the museum has a lot to offer in terms of fun and learning."

A worthy ambition, and I hope it works. The children there last Sunday were having fun, even though the show is neither proper sport, nor solid science. It is best suited to under-tens. There are some lengthy queues, and it isn't an especially cheap day out.

CHESS by Raymond Keene

THE chess world has been sur-prised recently by a spate of successes by young players. Regular readers of my daily column will have noticed there a win by nine-year-old Gawain Jones against the international master Malcolm Pein, chess correspondent of The Daily Telegraph. Gawain achieved the distinction of becoming the youngest player ever to have taken a game in an official tournament off an international master. Not to be outdone, the 14-year-old French hoy Etienne Bacrot has achieved what many thought inpossible, earning the title grandmaster at the age of 14 years and two months, breaking the records set by Bobby Fischer, Judit Polgar and Peter Leko.

One of Black's less solid defences to the Queen's Clambit. The idea is to obtain a menacing queenside pawn majority which could prove deadly against a white player who is not up with the theory or fulls to react with sufficient vigour. 7 cxd5 exd5 8 Qc2 Qa5 9 Bd3 0-0 10 0-0 c4

Re8 12 Nd2 g6 11 Bf5

It seems strange to give up the light squares in this fashion whilst also reding Black the advantage of the bishop pair. 13 Bh3 is certainly possible, but White's choice has the advantage of retarding Black's development, since he must now recapture with the knight.

13 . . . Nxd7 14 Rael. White is clearly massing for a counter-break in the centre.

with his strategy, a central advance

based on e-I. Black, though, now misses the point of his own operations. In striving for an exchange of queens, which White can easily evade. Black renounces the main theme of his defence, which consists of counter-attack against the white pawn on c3. Hence, 16 . . . Bd7 followed by . . . Na4 is the

WINNING MOVE

by Robert Sheehan

A "PSYCHIC" bid is a bluff bid designed to interfere with the opponents' budding or play. The Laws of bridge make it clear that it is a legitimate ruse. But if a player assumes, with no direct evidence, that his partner has psyched, in some circumstances a tournament director may rule against his side. However, if a player can deduce from the bidding that his partner has psyched, it is perfectly in order for him to use the information. The Welsh player sitting South should have made such a deduction on this hand, from the 1997 Macallan Camrose Trophy match between Wales and Scotland.

Contract: Five Diamonds doubled, by South, Lead: the ace of spades

(1) The psyche — with a convenient escape route into diamonds, this was a reasonable moment for North to try mixing it up. The standard meaning of Redouble is that North has a good, defensivelyoriented hand, with at least nine points. With a genuine shapely raise to Three Diamonds North would bid 2NT. An immediate raise to Three Diamonds would be pre-emprive, a possible bid on this hand.

(2) Still consistent with having a genuine redouble, awaiting developments, but denying good diamond support — with that he would bid Three Diamonds now. (3) This can't be right. A double after bidding no-trumps should be for penalties, particularly opposite a partner who has said he was willing to punish the opponents. (4) Presumably for penalties, but by now South probably had enough evidence to pass.

(5) This announced to the whole table, and most of the kibitzers, that North's Redouble was not kosher. With diamond support and a good hand North would have entered the auction earlier - see (2).

(6) Obrusely maintaining his unshakeable trust in his partner. If South had passed, North-South at worst would have achieved the par result — East-West bidding and making Four Spades, as happened at the other table. And if West had passed Four Diamonds, or dou-bled, North-South would have gained on the board. Five Dia-monds Doubled went three off for 800 to East-West.

 The first Mind Sports Olympiad will be held at the Royal Festival Hall, London from August 18 to 24. 1497. There are over 30 different events, including bridge, gin rummy, backgammon, three types of chess, Go and Scrabble.

All inquiries should be directed to David Levy, 0171-485 91-16.

COMPUTER GAMES AND PASTIMES

I HAVE been in hospital for the last week and I'm exhausted. While I was there I rubbed shoulders with those suffering Bloaty Head, Slack Tongue, Broken Wind, 3rd Degree Sideburns and The Squits. Not all were lucky, the Grim Reaper claimed his fair share.

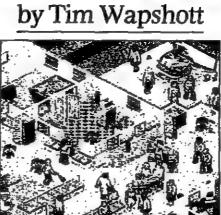

Bullfrog's Theme Hospital is a real tonic. The grown-up brother of the company's Theme Park, now it's time to play hospital adminis-trator and design, build and oversee smooth operations of all things medicinal in the hospitals of your dreams. Basic constructions include receptions, GP consulting rooms and pharmacies manned variously by receptionists, nurses, house doctors and consultants. Like all god games, the key is in the planning and with each new canvas you find yourself trying new layouts to maximise the efficiency of your resources while keepheads low. Money is life blood of any administrative reign, and it has a habit of drying up when you least expect it. As well as treatments and cures, patients will walk out prematurely if you can't keep them warm or, to quench their thirst, place them within arm's reach of drinks machines. Doctors and consultants have a broad knowledge of medicine but some are qualified in psychiatry, surgery or research and can thus deal with unusual complaints. Your specialists can teach lesser doctors in training rooms. Keeping all parties content is a real balancing act.

Underpay or overwork staff and they will walk out. Slack up their workload too much, though, and they'll spend more time strolling to and from their common rooms than working. Hardest to placate are the handymen. who water plants, maintain machinery and mop-up vomit. The game engine also regurgitates when the overall balance of your operation is clumsy, sending penalty earthquakes which can damage or destroy your expensive out, the room falls into disrepair and cannot be used again. In addition to daily patient quotas, emergency cases turn up on your doorstep two ways - either with sick people flown in to the hospital helipad or as illness outbreaks which can turn into epidemics. Failure to contain an epidemic

results in severe fines imposed by progresses through a series of increasingly demanding scenarios, presented in a predetermined order so you never know what you have to do next until you get there. More complex breakthroughs only come to light in later campaigns. The sound of tills is never far away, nor are the cheers and jeers of your patients relaying their gut feelings to you. When patients die their souls float upwards to celestial strains.

Most stimulating is the constant Tannoy babble of the receptionist, beckoning nurses and doctors to different treatment rooms or reminding patients to have their cheque books handy. Her delivery hits just the right note of irritation, trotted off in perfect "Thank you for telephoning Holiday Inns. my name is Debbie, how may I help you?" style. Her voice even rises at the end of some sentences, unnecessarily turning bland statements into questions. All that is known of the person behind the voice is that she was an out-of-work actress girlfriend of one of the development team. I hope she was paid well for her efforts since she is responsible for a good 20 per cent of Theme Hospital's enduring appeal. This is a game which will take the best part of a month to complete, only then might you get sick of it. The screen is rich in detail with bustling citizens but an option to pull back and view the entire hospital is missing. Also, beware the game's load and save options which are fiddly and ambiguous it's easy to load an old game by mistake as you try to save, but instead lose, a current game.

After the first marathon session will dawn on you that you have played this game before. In some respects, though much more refined, it's a carbon copy of Theme Park. Where you once built rides to entertain punters und employed handymen to maintain them and clean up litter and vomit, you now build treatment rooms and again employ handymen for menial maintenance and cleaning. Theme Hospital is also like many other games, from Civilisation to SimTower and Command & Conquer. With a different packaging you are still effectively training up and dispatching troops while ongoing research gives you bigger and better toys to help. Still, the hospital subject matter remains a good wheeze.

This week's Top Tip, winning him a Microsoft title, comes from Alex Bowler of Chesterfield: "To prevent eye strain from hours of playing Solitaire, turn the monitor around and get a friend to describe the screen to you.

Boxing promoter Frank Warren has a new heavyweight. Helen Mound reports ntroducing Frank Warren's latest recruit, Hummer, 6ft tall, 7ft wide and weighing in at three-and-a-half tonnes. A heavyweight the like of which Britain has never seen. The boxing promoter is used to keeping company with large, powerful characters such as Frank Bruno or Mike Tyson, but despite the name and impressive credentials, Hummer is a new addition to Warren's garage, not his team of professional boxers.

Designed as an "unstoppable military vehicle" for the American army, it's taken a while for Warren to learn how to handle the Hummer on British ads. He thought he'd discovered a schnical problem the first time he drove it in London. "I said to my passengers "What's that clicking noise?" and they fell about because I was hitting the door mirrors on every parked car I passed and leaving a trail of broken glass behind me."

Not that Warren is unused to big cars - he's come a long way since he bought a Mini as his first - but the luxury military vehicle must look at odds alongside his Bentley. Aston Martin and Austin Healey.

Don King, the extraordinary-haired US boxing promoter, noticed the trend for military, vehicles among the rich and famous last year and decided to indulge himself. Dining in New York with Warren, the subject of Hummers

I'm ordering five," declared King. What's a Hummer?" asked Warren. "It's a giant four-wheel drive. You should have one, you'll love it," replied King. And before Warren could say "High Mobility Multi-Purpose Wheeled Vehicle" (its full military name), King had made a call on his mobile phone to the local dealer and a sixth $75,000 (£46,800) Hummer was ordered.

"I had no idea what it was until it arrived in the UK four months ago," laughs Warren, clearly delighted with his present from King. He's had the seats trimmed with cream leather (the Americans have a nasty fashion for crushed velour). fitted it with a powerful stereo and a new security system and

a suproof, but cutting into the bullet-proof bodywork would be a tough job. The Hummer is techniparked in cally the same as those used in war zones; permanent the drive' four-wheel drive, self-inflat-ing and deflating tyres, bulletproof bodywork and glass and bombproof underbody. And yes. Warren does wish he'd had one five years ago in Barking when he was shot and spent weeks in intensive care.

The total cost of Warren's Hummer is probably close to £100,000 including the type-approval changes (new lights and indicators), import duties and shipping expenses and the optional nothing compared with what the annual fuel bills will be. Warren drives this 5.7-litre V8 petrol model every day: it can cruise at up to 90mph, but at best it can achieve only 12mpg; use a lot of throule and it drops to 7mpg. Filling the 23-gallon tank and 17-gallon reserve costs around £120, someone to service the Hummer is going to be a challenge for Warren, although there are US army bases in East Anglia that work on the military verlove it, but sions. But a local agricultural engineering firm that normally services tractors has carried out the first oil

> It comes as no surprise to learn that it's power that delights Britain's leading boxing promoter. "Big engines, love 'em," he grins broadly when he talks about the Hummer's performance. Shifting to 30mph in five seconds feels knockout, although getting to 60mph in nearly 20 seconds is a little lethargic. But, despite its size and wide track, it has a tight turning circle and is surprisingly nimble thanks in part to its very low centre of gravity. The only drawback is the hyper-light power steering that provides absolutely no feel. But it's not a problem, as the likelihood of any driver chucking three-titanium through winding roads is

The American army carries out Arctic and desert operations in raucous 6.5-litre turbodiesel Hummers that sound like something out of Mad Max. The civilian petrol version has a more familiar V8 growl that announces Warren's arrival as effectively as a team of Rottweilers snapping at your ankles. Residents of Herrford, where Warren has his offices, have begun to get used to the daily appearance of this monster, but every so often he notices with satisfaction the dropped jaws and amazed stares. "People definitely keep out of its way," he says proudly.

The Warren family currently enjoy total exclusivity in owning the only luxury civilian Hummer in Britain, but that isn't likely to last for long. "[Prince] him one, and I know Eubank is also keen," admits Warren. Chris Eubank is likely to take delivery of a new Hummer any day — he was recently sported buying one in Dubai by an ITV

Despite the exclusivity, Susan Warren isn't as keen on the Hummer as her husband. "The kids love it, but my wife hates it. She doesn't like it being parked in the drive."

THE GOOD, THE BAD AND THE DOWNRIGHT UNPLEASANT

They're all in the J.D. Power report on car satisfaction in this month's Top Gear magazine

America before highways start to resemble giant exhibitions staged by advertising companies. Indeed the surest way to recognise that a town is looming is to measure the gaps between hoardings: the closer together, the nearer the town.

In Britain this kind of thing is frowned upon, and planning regulations are fairly strict. But in recent years there has been a trend towards unofficial signs, placed at the side of the road by individuals announcing everything from "Good Food 200 yards" to "Happy 40th Ron". At worst, this is irritating and tacky, but does not seriously impinge on the landscape. But, contrary to the bold words of politicians who extol personal responsibility. Britain re-themselves. But some safety signs are of dubious value and constitute an insult to the intelligence.

Last week on an A road in Somerset I passed a sign that said "Hidden dips for two miles". followed later by the inevitable "End of hidden dips". The dips did not seem hidden to me, but I suppose it could be argued that an overtaking manoeuvre might suddenly be compromised by an oncoming vehicle appearing out of a dip. Pretty marginal, though.

My favourite safety sign consists of three words: "Slippery when wet". Each time I offer a word of thanks to the scientists who have worked out that surfaces become slippery when they are wet, although I do think there is a case for the more positive and upbeat: "Not slippery when dry". Have you noticed the sign for elderly people? It consists of a black outline showing two bent over human figures, one of whom is using a walking stick. I think it unlikely that anyone could condude there must be a water diviner ahead; it obviously con-cerns aged folk. But it still bears the words "Elderly people" below the symbol just in case.

Such signs assume no ability to think on the part of drivers and lengths. But there is another cluster which actually work against road safety: the signs directing us to places of interest, such as National Trust properties. Some are useful. They work best if each sign contains one place of interest and, because the background is brown, they cannot be confused with road directions. However, there are now quite busy road junctions in some places where a single, huge brown sign contains information about four or five venues. This is too much. I may want to know the way to

um, the 18th-century Belt-Driven Tractor Exhibition, the Home for Distressed Barn Owls or the Charles Dickens Working Chimney Sweep Expo, but I do not think I want all this information at a roundabout which also contains road signs to eight places at every point of the compass.

Roundabouts are inherently dangerous because attitudes to them vary. Some drivers have either never heard of the rule about giving way to traffic on one's right or simply ignore it, therefore there is a good chance of hitting someone. Magistrates áre not famously lenient if you claim to have been absorbed in deciding whether the Jacobean Leather Truss Museum required the second or third exit.

The problem is likely to get worse before it gets better. Heritage is big business and competition in the industry is intense. But so is competition among supermarkets, and if we allow this signing on a basis of need, Sainsbury and Tesco will demand equal treatment.

There is a simple solution. Tourist maps contain places of interest, so half the brown signs along our roads could be torn. down, thus encouraging people to re-acquire the art of map reading.

Danger peer ahead

Eve-Ann Prentice

on the car story

THE Marquess of Queensberry carried a loaded revolver ready to shoot at them. Rudyard Kipling thought they were "civilising agents", and Victoria was not amused by the "horrible machines". They were talking at the turn of the century about the motor car. Now, love it or loath it, few could argue that the car has become the icon of this century. More than 70 per cent of adults have come to rely on the internal combustion engine. according to an RAC survey released vesterday.

■ CARS and their drivers have been villfied from the word go, with pioneers in the 1890s branded "Carbarians" Trafalgar Square billboards denouncing motor travel, and cars described as "evil smelling" and "petrol-piddling monsters".

Passions for and against the car are included in The Motoring Century, a history of the RAC published yesterday as part of the organisation's centenary celebrations. The Marquess of Queensberry, better-known for bringing "gentlemanly" rules to pugi lism, is revealed as an early road-rager who declared that he intended to carry a loaded revolver for the "purpose of shooting dangerous drivers".

■ WRITTEN by Piers Brendon. Fellow of Churchill College, Cambridge, the book also contains some of the more outlandish moves to curb per-ceived driving excesses 100 years ago. These included a wire which was stretched across the Slough-to-Maidenhead road in an apparent attempt to decapitate drivers, and the farmers who suggested that bombs be fitted to vehicles so that over-enthusiastic acceleration would trigger an explosion. None the less, the car did relieve one big pollution headache for the late Victorians. At the end of the 1900s, each of Britain's three million horses. most of them in urban areas. tween three and four tons of won't find a worker on the Jaguar production line who doesn't know where we stand in these rankings. We knew we had to improve and this was the best measure we could find. Our dealers have always been enthusiasts. Frankly, in the dark days I think we owed our survival to them, but now we are giving them the products they deserve." Mike Beasley, director of manufacturing operations in Coventry, says getting that kind of quality takes more than simply introducing Japanese working methods. "We introduced radical changes with the unions which brought team-working to the shop floor. It's a question of combining the Japanese mindset with British ingenuity. You have to give the guys on the production line ways of examining themselves against the cus-tomers view. Then they've got a real incentive to improve." But the other key element has been skill. Unlike large volume manufacturers who can now rely on robots to keep rigid quality control, Jaguar with its wide range of tailor-made models and comparatively low volumes, still relies heavily on manpower. "You need skill and rigid discipline. of the XK 8 right first time," says Beasley. The Jaguar award coincided excellent news on the sales front with that outstanding new sports car helping the company achieve first quarter sales of 10,931, the best since 1990. So will Ford be trying to learn from Jaguar's improvement? Scheele, who although now an American citizen was born in Brentwood where Ford has its British headquarters, suggests not: "Let's just say we work independently of our parent company."

The Power survey is done in Britain with the help of Top Gear magazine and relies on the detailed experiences of 16.498 motorists who ran 87 models from 33 makers over two years. It is the large sample size and long-term information that has made it the most authoritative record of motoring experience.

For Subaru, the achievment of topping the satisfaction index is tempered. Ed Swatman, managing director, was delighted with his award but fears his chances to capitalise on it will be limited by further European Union quotas on imported Japanese cars.

Dawn of revival for a 96-year-old legend

opes for a fully-fledged revival of the ▲ proud name of AC cars were boosted this week when the new owners of the marque appointed their first dealership, Eve-Ann Prentice

AC - one of Britain's oldest surviving makers, dating back to 1901 - was bought from receivers by Alan Lubinsky in December last year. Now Portfield Sports and Classics in Rochester. West Sussex have been given the pioneer dealership. Portfield director Mike restriction was imposed on motorways in the 1960s, a Cobra was clocked doing 196pmh ... they really are fantastic cars. I am absolutely thrilled by the prospect of selling them and it is wonderful the company has been resurrected." Portfield, which already deals in TVR, Aston Martin, Lagondas and Morgans. hopes to sell at least 12 Cobra MKIVs a year - at around £70,000 each - and there are plans to sell the latest version of the AC Ace towards the end of the year. The Cobra MKIV is custom-built in Weybridge. Surrey, based on the famous design perfected by Texan racing driver Carroll Shelby.

Portfield describes its latest Ford V8 engine as "brutally fast". The name AC is an abbreviation of Autocarrier, a 1907 model launched by the company's founders, John Weller and John Portwine, who set un their engineering workshop in South London in 1901. In 1963, the Cobra's 196mph adventure on the Mi led to questions in Parliament, Two years later, it won the Sports Car World Championship.

Controlling interest in AC cars was sold to Autokraft and Ford in 1986 and in 1992 Brian Angliss acquired Ford's interests. But four years later, the company was put in the hands of receivers and devotees were beginning to fear the worst when Lubinsky's Pride Automotive Group set up the AC Car Group to step in and save the marque.

Lubinsky says: "We are in full production of the Cobra right now and are working to maintain and increase the AC presence in the buoyant mar-ket for high performance

t has taken three decades as a motoring scribe, but at last I have done it. I have crossed Europe to road test a new colour. Yellow, Monte Carlo Yellow, no less, and it was absolutely essential to go to Monte Carlo to sample it. And yes, it drives well,

This is the latest hue - the 12th in fact - to become available on the Saub 900 convertible, and in case you suppose the Swedes have gone porty or become desperate, understand that the 900 convertible is a very important model indeed: that June 10 sees the company's 50th birthday and this is by way of being a celebratory version.

The first production Saab. convertible, the 900 of 1984, started life as no more than an illustration from the 900 suloon brochure with the superstructure snipped off with scissors by one of the firm's designers. Aribert Valen-breder this clumsy concept was pinned to his studio wall for a year before a visitor, Saab US marketing executive Robert J Sinclair, spotted it and urged the company to pursue the idea.

Since the current secondgeneration 900 convertible was designed in parallel with the 900 saloon rather than as an afterthought, its structural integrity is absolute: in some types of crashes, convertible occupants are said to be safer than those in the saloon.

Saab crash test procedures, meanwhile, uniquely include collisions with a dummy moose, because incidents involving large animals account for more than a quarter of all

Scandinavian road accidents. The complex roof mechanisms and motors of the current 900 convertibles are. enclosed within the tonneau roof: this is referred to in the firm as "the 27-second job" because that is the time the roof takes to open or close and we do a lot of things you won't notice, but if we didn't,

Saab makes and sells a bigger ratio of convertibles to saloons than any other car maker anywhere in the UK one Saab registration in four is of a drophead, and Britain takes 16.2 per cent of all the convertibles the company produces. North America takes 47.6 per cent, Italy is third with 7 per cent. In all, more than 50 countries import it.

BMW gives a boost to hyperinflation

You can now be protected by 12 airbags — but the car might I blow up, says

ew cars could soon be compped with a dozen airbags, claims BMW. And at the launch of its latest airbag innovation, a spokesman for the German carmaker admitted that if all the devices were to deploy at one time, the explosions would be sufficient to "probably break-up the car".

Launching its new headbag an airbag designed to protect the driver and front passenger from severe head injuries in a side-on collision - BMW has brought the total of possible airbags in a luxury car to 12 Two front airbags, two rear-passenger airbags in the back of the front seats, four sidebags and now four headbags. It would feel like being apped inside a bouncy castle

if they all went off at once. But the company insists that it is highly unlikely for every airbag to be activated in one go, because the sensors are intelligent enough to know which devices to activate and different types of collisions trigger different sensors. For comple, it says, a head-on accident is unlikely to set off side airbags, and, depending on the force of the crash, front airbags may not go off in a side on collision. BMW's new tubular-shaped

BMW's headbag under test: it also offers protection from splinters if the window breaks

headbag is hidden in the roof, and when triggered extends diagonally across the front side window. Attached at the bottom of the car's A-pillar (near the dashboard) and the top of the B-pillar (near the grab handle), it follows the curved roofline. When the sensors ignite the device, the inflatable tubular structure (ITS for short) bursts out from the roof lining in milliseconds. The inflation causes it to shorten as it forms a straight and rigid tube of padding across the window. And because it isn't folded away. like an ordinary airbag, it doesn't need such an aggressive explosion to inflate it.

BMW fitted side airbags as standard on its 5 and 7 Series last year, claiming a 50 per cent reduction in the risk of injury from side on collisions. The company has been examining accidents involving its cars since 1976 and says side-cent of all accidents, but are responsible for more than 36 per cent of all cases of injury. Having fitted side airbags to protect the chest, BMW used its accident research and computer simulation of car crashes to develop the headbag. The new airbag has several benefits; it helps reduce sharp movements of the head that cause injury to the neck; it protects occupants from obects hitting or entering the car from the side; its tough fabric

All-round protection from BMW: if they all went off at the same time, it would be like being trapped in a bouncy castle offers protection from glass splinters when the side window breaks; and its rigid structure stops the occupants from being thrown out of the car if it rolls over.

BMW says that 12 airbags is probably the maximum proection possible in a car and has no plans to fit its new headbag for rear passengers. The company says it only fits airbags where research shows need, and as yet head mjuries to rear passengers have been minimal.

BMW believes that the line the tubular airbag follows corresponds to the eye-level of occupants of virtually any size. A short driver who sits close to the steering wheel and a tall driver sitting further away would both benefit from the headbag. A spokesman did admit that, "for a smaller driver sitting far back it would be ineffective".

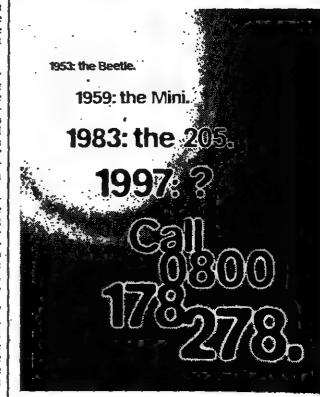

However a solution for different shaped drivers is on the way. BMW hopes to have intelligent airbags fitted in its cars within five years. Using electronics that can assess how tall and heavy the occupant is, their seating position, the car's will be able to trigger the appropriate airbags with the required force to suit that particular situation.

seems as if demand for airbags has got a little out of hand. In the same month that BMW has launched its headbags, and Volvo announced a device called been working on a "safety car" that features, among other ideas, a bonnet airbag to soften the blow to pedestrians.

Meanwhile the Scandina vian authorities — who were instrumental in making airbaes commonplace in modern cars - have passed legisladisconnect passenger airbags if the customer requests it, because of fears of decapitation to children in the front.

Fitted as standard to 5 and 7 Series models from September, BMW's new headbag will add £200 to the price of the cars. Customers wanting the device on the 3 Series will have to wait for the all-new models

Vest Deals Peoplet 306 SLDT ... 4171 iları (20) Ameriyanda mata (5595 Jacqui Tait, the first woman to join the Conservative Whips' office, talks to Andrew Pierce

'I am sure that I entertained many sun worshippers'

acqui Lait made Parliamentary history last year when she became the first woman the join the all-male bastion of the Tory whips office. Even Margaret Thatcher, as Prime Minister, only stepped into the portals with permission of the Chief Whip.

But with a husband, two brothers and five nephews, she is used to dealing with members of the opposite sex. Currently defending a majority of 6.600 at Hastings & Rye. Mrs Lait has had plenty of experience with truculent men. She worked behind the bar at Strathelyde University and specialised in ejecting drunken customers.

How did you first learn to drive?

I had driving lessons for my 17th birthday from my mother. The driving school cars were Triumph Heralds. It is a slur on cart horses to say that they drove like them.

What was your first car?

A Mini Countryman, which had so much mileage that when I had it serviced, after a 6,000-mile trip to Portugal, I was told they never expected to see it again. I used it for years afterwards.

STEERING COLUMN

What car do you drive now.

A four-litre Jaguar saloon. My mother drove Jaguars, so I was

Do you like driving?

I love it. But I am a rotten passenger and cannot sit in the back reading maps. I have been driving automatics for years now, but often long for a nice manual gearbox to have fun with.

What is your most hated car?

Any boy racer, of any age, in any car who gets too pushy.

What is your dream car?

A new Jaguar, but still a saloon. I need something that is both fast and comfortable. When I'm travelling, I regard the car as my home. It has my office, clothes, bottles of water and serves as a dining room too. It is usually littered with sandwich packets and empty water hortles.

What is your worst habit in the car?

My husband informs me it is taking out a contact lens at one set of traffic lights, cleaning it, popping it back in at the next set and so on. What he does not seem to grasp is that my eyes are not equally bad, so they adjust over short distances.

What infuriates you most about other drivers?

I don't mind other motorists. It is cycle couriers, who either sit in my blind spot or try to pass me on the inside after I have signalled I am turning left. Motorcycle couriers are not much better. Practically all the scratches and dents on the car are a result of couriers driving up the wrong side of the road towards me sneaking hetween cars in non-existent spaces.

What is the most unusual thing you have done in your car?

Changing into full evening rig in the car takes great skill. The last time I did a complete change was on the seafront in Porthcawl, on a blazing hot June Saturday after the Welsh Tory party conference. I am Jacqui Tait: "When I'm travelling, I regard the car as my home. It has my office, clothes, bottles of water and serves as a dining room."

change decorously.

What do you listen to in the car?

sure that I entertained many sun worshippers as I struggled to Radio 4 for extended news, but mainly Classic FM. On long journeys, an opera cassette. I wish I had a radio which would automatically change frequencies.

Have you ever had points on your licence?

The last time was in the 1960s. The first set was when I was driving with my brother out of Glasgow to watch a rugby international at Murrayfield. The second was nine months later, that time for crossing a stop sign. Since then my licence

Saddle up and ride off with your wheels

Families are increasingly taking their bikes by car — but what's the best way? Hilary Stone looks at the cycle racks on the market icycles are becoming more a lifestyle accessory, with the mountain bike in particular now an integral part of family life. But the best leisure cycling is rarely done within a town or city; most riders prefer to seek quiet roads or picturesque off-road routes — which means carrying their bikes by car to their destinations.

Unless you have a large estate, or pull the bike apart every time you go out, some form of carrying rack is essential. Buying a rack for the first time can be a perplexing experience as there are several types and a vast range of models, but every car owner, whether of an Porsche or Citroen 2CV, will find there's one to suit their needs.

THE traditional solution, with cycle fittings. They increase fuel consumption by between 15 and 25 per cent, but it is easy to carry three, sometimes four, bikes and there are no hassles with obscured numberplates or

There are three types: those to carry the bikes upside down, clamping handlebars and saddles (not recommended because it stresses them in a way they are not desinged for and the bikes are less stable); bicycles right way up with front wheel removed; and right way up with a wheel trough and support arm. Right way up with front wheel removed is the choice of many pro bike teams, bikes are quick to load/unload. But for most, right way up with a wheel trough is best. Do not exceed the recommended

Leading manufacturers, such as Automaxi or Thule, make fittings to suit practically all cars. Locks are a worthwhile extra. And don't forget your extra height: many bikes are damaged by height-restricting barriers at car parks.

My favourite system comprises Thule's best roof bars combined with the Thule Tour cycle carrier, which is exceptionally secure and kind to both car and bike. Elite San Remo (£17.95 each) fittings will fit most roof bars and are the only ones available for front wheel-out firment.

TOW BAR MOUNTED

■ WILL carry two, three or occasionally four bikes. Fuel consumption is barely affected, but a tow bar and electrics are required, which adds £100 or more to the cost.

There are two main types, fitting either directly to the tow ball or to a plate behind it. The tow ball-mounted type (pendle does one for three bikes at £78) are quick and easy to fit and great for those who have a continental-style towbar with integral tow ball.

Most tow bar mounted racks use two support arms from which the bikes — which need padding to prevent damage — are hung. Attachment loops for fixing straps help and can be used with a lock. Another type supports each bike by the wheels and with a central support tube. These are kind to the bikes but are heavier, more expensive and difficult to store. Pendle makes a great wheel support rack costing from £120.

We recommend the Pendle (£78) and Witter (£56.99) plate-mounted tow bar racks.

but with many pitfalls. They attach to the boot or rear door with straps and carry the bikes on two arms. The bikes need padding to prevent damage. Because the bikes obscure the numberplate and lights, most will need a numberplate lighting board.

There are several designs that mount the bikes up high (Halfords, Bell Sport, Automaxi, Rhode Gear or Hollywood) to avoid this problem, but, as with roof racks, they increase fuel consumption.

Cars with fibreglass rear boots or doors cannot use this type of rack and those with all glass rear doors need kits to secure the straps available from Rhode Gear and Automaxi. The best have six straps and easily adjusted arms with a good choice of positions.Get the straps tight, particularly the lower two, which should be tightened after the bikes are mounted. Strap hooks need to be generously sized and plastic coated. Rhode Gear, Graher, Pendle, Automaxi, Bell Sport and Hollywood are recommended.

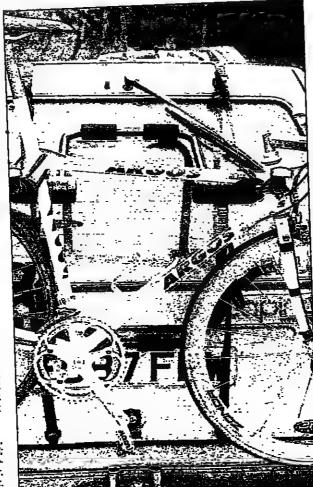

OTHER TYPES

FOR 4x4 owners most manufacturers make racks that attach to the rear-mounted spare wheel and have arms like the tow bar-mounted versions. For carrying bikes on a sports car boot lid, Automaxi offers a two-cycle carrier that fits its standard Maxi Back Load system which, with rack and cycle carrier, costs £240.

Suppliers include Automaxi, 01525-283131: Elite, 01664-444513; Graber, 0115-485-5706; Hollywood, 0181-805-3088; Rhode Gear, 0181-954-7748; Paddy Hopkirk, 01525-850800: Pendle, 01282-09555: Thule, 01275-340404, Witter, 01244-241166.

Traditional roof racks can even be fitted to glamour cars such as Porsche's Boxster. But they increase fuel consumption — and beware of low barriers at car park entrances

Easy-to-use Rhode Gear Suttle strap-mounted rack

BIKE RACKS AND THE LAW

■ ANY LOAD attached to your car must be properly secured. The maximum all-up weight of the car should not be exceeded.

THE biggest problem arises from rear-mounted racks obscuring lights and numberplates; last summer, several police forces made a special point of cracking down on this. Lights must be clearly visible from all normal angles and the numberplate must not be obscured.

It Is not good enough to simply hang a numberplate from the rack; it must be illuminated as well. With all but a few high mount rear racks, it is essential to use a proper lighting board.

■ LIGHTING kits are available from Halfords and Automaxi; with modern cars. it's wise to get them professionally fitted.

Wheel support racks can be used when towing a caravan sector of the market. Avon Tyres have come up with the CR322, which promises more miles per gallon on a wide spectrum of mid-range cars.

Fuel savings of up to 5 per cent come from lower rolling resistance on the road, achieved by lightweight build and reduced deformation combined with improved tread construction; as well as offering improved wer grip, the tread has also been computer-analysed to identify patterns that produce less noise. Avon claims an environmental bonus by using advanced production techniques that have eliminated the use of traditional hydrocarbon solvents. The tyres are available in more than 20 sizes.

£4,200 in the past year. The research was done by Equifax-HPf, the company that can check the status of any used car and will report, among other things, whether it has been stolen, has finance owing on it or has been written off. Tony Worthy, managing director, says: This is a big increase compared to inflation. We believe there are two reasons. First, there has been an increase in disposable income. Second, the 'nearly new' bug has caught on fast as people realise they can get more for their money by buying used.

But the increase rings warning bells. For example, we have nearly six million vehicles subject to outstanding finance on our database and in January one in eight cars checked were recorded there."

o cruising along some sun-soaked corniche for an hour or so on silken tarmac for this test, but 950 miles, starting and finishing in East London traffic with copious motorway, Edinburgh, the Lake District (including Shap) and assorted country roads in between.

And, for much of the time, Gothic weather: serious wind and rainfall that would have done wonders for shares in Noah and Sons (Arks R Us) ple. Throughout it all, the cabin of the V90 (until recently called the 960) estate was indifferent, solid as a castle on wheels, effortless and smooth,

Part of the marque's legend is that it is not exciting; true, but we felt incredibly secure. The V90 is comfortable enough to drive for hours and emerge from the front seat without terminal stiffness and offers the advantages of size without its drawbacks. With rear-wheel drive, the turning lock is amazing, the car seeming almost to glide sideways.

I was changing gear on the rev counter rather than the speedometer. You can move up quickly, going into fifth at around 50mph, when the engine still feels comfortable at between 2,000 and 3,000rpm, reducing fuel consumption. Volvo has official figures of course, but my experience on a wide variety of road and traffic conditions over a week worked out at about 10 miles for El (an unusua) measurement system, perhaps, but you get the point). The target market for the V90 is my Volvo has invested vast sums in recent years adding a sporty edge to its "safety-conscious load lugging" image in an attempt to attract younger buyers. But somehow the top-of-the-range, leather and wood-finished estate is the last place you'd expect that switch to be apparent. That the car handles and rides as well as it does shows how thorough Volvo has been in applying the lessons learnt in touring car racing to this executive flagship.

I'd never understood why the big Volvo estate was such a popular vehicle for the suburban school run before. It may look a bit unwieldly, but in town the steering is a pleasant surprise. With just 3.5 turns lock-tolock, it has a turning circle of 9.7 metres and the car manouvres as neatly as many smaller hatchbacks. This agility, together with the attention paid to safety, suggests that Volvo's corner of the school-run market will not suffer from its change of image. In fact the 900-series commands one of the highest rates of owner loyalty of any large car. There is only one major problem for such a large car, the space around the pedals seems extraordinarily small, surely something which

Volvo's engineers could solve? sive load-carrying capacity, this is a

Ducati's ST2 sports-tourer appeals to the head as well as the heart, says Roland Brown > t's appropriate that Ducati's first new model since the firm was taken over last year should not be a super-sports machine, all sleek styling and outrageous performance, but the ST2, a more rounded and sensible sports-tourer. Pure sportsters, such as Ducati's gorgeous 916, succeed by appealing only to the heart; sports-tourers have to capture the head as well.

> Few sports-touring riders would have been tempted by a Ducati in recent years as the Bologna firm struggled through a cash crisis that resulted in lost production, long delays for customers and reliability problems. But now the overdue invoices have been paid off by Texas Pacific the American investment group that bought a 51 per cent stake in Ducati last September. Texas Pacific insists that a

ST provides the perfect opportunity to prove it. The ST2 has the Ducati trademarks of a big V-twin engine and tubular steel "ladder" frame. But its bodywork, designed as much for practicality as style, cannot match the beauty of the more stream-lined 916. The new bike's engine is based on the single overhead camshaft, two-valves-per-cylinder unit from the 900SS (hence the ST2 name: an eight-valve ST4 is due next year). The motor is enlarged to 944cc, cooled by water instead of air and oil. and fed by a fuel-injection system in place of carburettors.

Chassis design and geometry could easily come from one of Ducati's traditional sports models, but the ST2 differs by

Ducati ST2: designed as much for practicality as style, it cannot match the beauty of the more streamlined 916, but it's fast and fine-handling incorporating touring features such as a fairly tall wind-screen, large fuel tank, centrestand and even the option of colour-matched luggage panniers. When you fire up the engine, there's a familiar Vtwin rumble, but the riding position is fairly roomy and relaxed, with a gentle lean forward to the slightly raised handlebars.

The ST2 was more at home on the roads of southern Spain than on the Jerez racetrack at which the launch was based. Its engine produces a respectable peak output of 83bhp at 8,500rpm, but is most impressive at lower revs. From below 50mph in top gear, the softlytuned V-twin's mid-range torque combines with crisp fuel-injection response to send the bike storming forward at a touch of the throttle.

That makes for swift overtaking on the road and, along, with a slick six-speed gearbox, allows effortless high-speed riding. The Ducan is smooth until about 6,000rpm, or 100mph in top gear, when its handlebars begin to tingle.

Ithough the ST2's top speed is a respectable 140mph, its softly-tuned engine runs out of breath at about 8,000rpm and doesn't encourage hard riding in the way a sportier machine would. Much the same is true of the chassis, which is more than adequate for rapid road riding but has too much suspension movement to match the precision of the finest sportsters. That made the ST2 competent rather than inspired on the track; on the road, the balance of comfort and control provided by the Japanese-made Showa front forks and rear shocks is just about right. And the sports-tourer's new generation Brembo front brake calipers give more stopping power even than the 916.

Other features are mostly good, too, although the lipped screen generates enough wind turbulence to give a noisy ride if you are tall. The fuel tank holds a generous 21 litres, the neat instrument panel includes a fuel gauge and a clock, the seat is broad and well-padded and the mirrors have split-image lenses (a first for bikes) providing wider rear vision. A passenger is well catered for as well, with plenty of DUCATI ST2

many smaller bikes.

Talk of luggage provides one reminder of the old Ducati; the integrated panniers will not be available until September, although deliveries of the bike, which costs £8,900, begin at the end of this

This will not help the firm's new management to persuade sports-touring riders - a far more pragmatic bunch than Ducati's hedonistic sports bike customers - that the ST2 can match the effici-ency and build quality of rivals such as Honda's everpopular VFR750F.

On the evidence so far, though. Texas Pacific is very serious about quality, to the extent of committing more than £40 million to improving production facilities in the next three years.

Maybe the ST2 is the kind of bike to respect rather than, like the 916, to fall madly in love with — but it's a fast, fine-handling and reasonably practical machine with plenty of Ducati's traditional V-twin character. If it approaches Japanese levels of reliability and that's a big if - the ST2

'A car that runs on gas sounds scary to a lot of people'

north London industrial estate trying to find the gas depot where I could refill the tank on my Honda Accord, I began to wonder whether liquefied petroleum gas (LPG) could really be a fuel of the future. Then I found the place, filled the tank and looked at the bill: 39p a litre. I began to think again.

With the unleaded petrol I usually buy costing close to 60p a litre, even the warning that LPG might be about 20 per cent heavier on fuel consumption paled into insignificance. If the fuel was 33 per cent cheaper. what would it matter?

Filling up proved no more difficult than filling up with petrol, although with variations. The Accord, like most LPG vehicles at present, is a dual-fuel car with separate fillers for gas and petrol. The gas one obviously has to be sealed, so it required the services of Brian Sisson, manager of Calor's London Centre, to show me how it was done, but then I've often hankered after the days of personal service on the forecourt. A twist connected the nozzle to the filler valve, a press on the button started the meter and a squeeze on the trigger just like any other filler was all it took.

believes will become familiar to many more British motor-ists in the near future. The first of a network of filling stations supplying LPG has just opened in South-east London. It comes in a form called Calor Autoblend and is being marketed under a joint agreement with Jet. The two companies are confident that once that 39p figure starts appearing on the forecourt billboards interest will gather and my backstreet experience will become a thing of the past.

in the search for an alternative to petrol and diesel, LPG must now be in pole position, thanks largely to the boost it got in last year's Budget, when duty was reduced by 25 per cent to 10.78p a litre, while that on petrol and diesel was eased again. But until now that reduction seemed to have achieved little in terms of profile, simply because there has been no network of roadside outlets for the fuel. There are an estimated 1,500 vehi-cles, mostly commercial, running around Britain on LPG.
The figure is growing, but is still pathetically few compared to the million-plus in Italy and the 450,000 in Holland:

The great advantage of LPG is cleanliness. It eliminates visible smoke and soot and its exhaust emissions are claimed to be 70 per cent lower than

As an alternative to petrol and diesel. LPG must be in pole position after the boost it got in last year's Budget, when duty was reduced by 25 per cent importantly, it produces no particulates, the harmful sooty specks blamed for the increas ing incidence of asthma and other lung diseases that have gone such a long way recently towards destroying any claims for diesel as an environmentally-friendly fuel.

It's not, of course, as clean as electricity, which produces no such emissions. But even the most advanced electric vehicles, on sale in America and undergoing tests in Coventry and elsewhere, suffer from the old problems of short range and heavy and costly batteries.

The idea of a car that runs on gas sounds a bit scary to a lot of people, but LPG has now been around for more than 60 years. Modern pressurised tanks, which have been subject to exhaustive tests, are equipped with cut-off valves

Double fillers on an LPG-converted car and the gas tank in the boot with cut-off valves that work automatically in accidents

So what is it like to drive a car fuelled by LPG? I borrowed the Accord for a week of commuting between home and office in London and house-viewing in Kent, follow ing routes I have covered in vehicles of almost every description from the desperately decrepit to the enviably extravagant. The answer is that once the car is going there is no

The only peculiarity is the starting procedure. There is a switch mounted on the centre console by which the driver because the pure gas is initially slow to mix with air, the et it run a few seconds, blip the throttle and it switches to gas. If you forget the blip, the gas simply cuts in the first time the engine exceeds 2,000rpm.

There is a third position in which it is possible — if you've run out of petrol, say — to start the car on gas alone, although because of the vagaries of the initial mixture this might provoke a backfire or brief misfire. If you run out of one fuel on the move, the switch to the other is automatic and happens without a hiccup, as I discovered to my relief in the middle of Euston Road. My one criticism of the conversion in the Accord was the gas gauge; a series of lights beneath this switch was im-

Calor and Jet's long-term aim, of course, is to encourage the introduction of specific LPG engines by major manufacturers. But the dual-fuel conver possible to read on the move and still required a great deal cars have virtually twice the

Rover's centre of tomorrow

Ian Morton visits

will design the millennium Mini

The Mini for the millennium — the car that will take the legend of the the Sixties into another century — will be born in Rover's new design and engineering centre in Warwickshire.

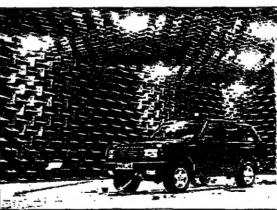

The £30 million centre has already produced the "Spiritu-al" Mini concept cars that captured the limelight at the Geneva motor show. Its creation, which has entirely taken place since BMW acquired Rover, appears to offer further confirmation that Munich intends Rover to remain a separate and largely self-pro-pelled partner within BMW.

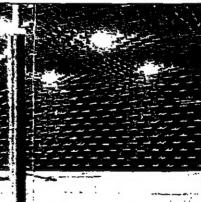

Sited on Rover's existing 900-acre text complex and proving ground at Gaydon. the centre was mooted in 1992 when it was decided to centralise the company's historically dispersed design, engineering and development studios. When BMW took over Rover in 1994, detailed planning had only just begun. "As a strongly engineering-led company, BMW fully supported Rover's ambitions to create a world-class product design and development centre in Britain, says Nick Stephenson, Rover Group design and engineering director.

"Rover's new facility plan fitted well with BMW's existing R&D resources."

Work started in March 1995. 14 months after BMW's takeover. Now more than 1,000 staff are designing Rovers for the millennium. A number are from BMW, but for that matter several Rover person-nel are now based in Munich.

There is duplication," admits Geoff Upex, design and concept director. We have here much of the same equipment that BMW has — strate-gically it would be silly for us to have different kit to BMW. We use the same automatic motorised measuring systems such as clay model-making,

Sound barrier: a Range Rover is noise-tested in the semi-anechoic chamber at Gaydon

wind tunnel." Projects begun and devel-oped at Gaydon will need Munich approval, says Upex. but on the same basis that Rover's previous owner, British Aeruspace, was expected to "take an intense interest at

No working balance has been established and there is no assumed formula for this, Upex adds. Some early work is being shared by Gaydon, Munich, independent design houses and BMW's technical centre in the US.

We have a relationship where on some projects we may co-operate, and on others we may compete. It's about best use of a total resource." Vastly airy, with daylight flooding in through huge windows, the centre includes a large showroom where toplevel discussions take place around the concept models on which decisions must be taken, a process modelled on BMW practice.

Outside is a "viewing garden where Rovers and rival products can be looked at in daylight from up to 100 yards, so that executives never lose contact with how the public sees vehicles.

The main building groups around a central thoroughfare - known as The Street - a number of specialist areas woodmill, trim development, fibreglass styling and a workshop where competitors' cars are stripped to reveal their secrets. Among the specialist research areas on the site established in the quest for more reliable and refined Rovers are two which have innovative facilities unmatched in the automotive industry. To tackle increasingly tough regulations to control the noise emitted by passing vehicles — and to overcome the exigences of British weather - Rover has brought the test indoors into a large semi-anechoic chamber (sound is absorbed by the walls to reduce echoes virtually to nil) in which a stationary vehicle is revved on

ment simulation test), a vehi-cle on a suspensionpummelling test rig may at the same time be subjected to the equivalent of intense sunlight from 27 high-frequency lamps each delivering 4 kilowatts — the same as standing unprotected in the middle of the Sahara at midday", according to the technician in charge while the temperature may be varied between -40C and +80C and the humidity can be adjusted from 5 to 95 per cent.

Introducing the Volvo V40. It's roomy, like the big estates. (There's 50 cubic feet of luggage space, and you can even fold the front passenger seat flat.) It's safe, like the big estates. (The V40 has SIPS with side airbags, driver's airbag and ABS brakes.) It's even surprisingly quick, just like the big estates (0-62 takes just 9.3 seconds in the 16 valve 2 litre model.) But the V40 has one thing the big estates don't have. Curves. The Italians, who know a thing or two about car design, recently voted it 'the most beautiful estate in the world't. And who are two argue? The V40 from Volvo. It's smaller, but it's perfectly formed. From £15,620 to £19,920 on the road. Or from £290 per month via Volvo Contract Hire; YONO. A CAR YOU CAN BELIEVE IN.
